

Boake Carter Tells of Adopting His Own 'Biblical Hebrew Faith'

By the Associated Press.

NEW YORK, Aug. 13.—Boake Carter, radio commentator and newspaper columnist, said yesterday that he had embraced a "biblical Hebrew faith" and was hard at work with David Horowitz, a biblical student of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., on a new translation of the Old Testament.

Mr. Carter declared that while Mr. Horowitz was on a visit to Jerusalem in 1927 he had come across a hermit, described by some persons as "the new prophet," living in caves along the route of the biblical exodus.

The hermit, Mr. Carter said, told Mr. Horowitz that after years of scientific research he had found that all versions and translations of the Bible, whether of Christian, Jewish or any other origin, had done grave injustice to the original Hebrew text.

Since his conversion to his new belief, after having previously tried the Church of England faith and Christian Science, Mr. Carter said he had been aiding Mr. Horowitz with translating the "true version" of the Old Testament as forwarded to them by the hermit, Moses Gulbory, from Palestine.

Mr. Carter said he had observed most rituals of Judaism since his conversion a year ago, but did not follow orthodox or "rabbinical Judaism, an organized religion."

"I'm finding the answer for which I was searching," he said. "Hitler is Satan. Germany is Assyria. The 10 lost tribes of Israel have not been lost. They are in the United States and England."

"It behooves the Anglo-Saxon-Celtic-Judaic peoples to observe the laws of Moses handed down for victory. It may be that because they don't observe the Mosaic laws, they are not winning the war."
