His counsel offered in evidence a copy of the Enquirer for June 6, 1941, the headline of which read:

"Wins highest award for journal-ism—barred from Germany by Himmler and Goering."

Griffin also produced copies of his newspaper containing an alleged expose of German activities in Mexico, and testified that he had always opposed Fascism.

On the issue of the Ku Klux Klan, he stated he was a Roman Catholic and "as such I have fought the Ku Klux Klan because of its attitude toward Catholics, Jews and Negroes."

Griffin testified that before Pearl Harbor, his newspaper had opposed United States' entry into the war, but. "after Pearl Harbor, the policy of my newspaper was all-out for a successful war."

The publisher denied all charges in the indictment, some of which dealt with mailing of letters and publications, and denied that he had conspired with any of the other 27 indicted.

He acknowledged knowing three of his co-defendants, among them George Sylvester Viereck. Viereck recently was convicted in Washington of failure to inform the State Department that he was acting as an agent of Germany. Proceedings were adjourned until Thursday.
