

I recall at the time I was avidly eager to watch and see that the 'sniper' at General Walker was recognized, found, apprehended, and brought to justice.

It seemed to me that the Dallas Police were sure to justify their reputation of 'getting their man'. More activity to cover this horrible sector of criminality seems required in Dallas, Texas, and U.S.A.

The law-breaker has broken bonds of society and his oath of allegiance to 'U.S.A.'; — that pattern is plain, and sets him off from his fellow-man, and leads to his discovery and arrest. He has 'busted' the moral and ethic law. So he's got no traffic signal for 'Danger' or 'Stop' — that is how he is found out.

I am sure you will have a stringent and well-rounded positive program to combat this menace.

is this used in Dallas?

I know Northwestern University; the FBI School; perhaps the University of Texas; as well as the example of Orlando Wilson and the computerized 'area' system employed by Orlando Wilson's efficient super-Police Dept in Chicago may all be models and inspiring ones, for an exemplary Dallas force. There are some great names in Texas police-work: the Rangers Kleunges; and Hamer; etc.. I know Dallas can live up to these frontier pioneer mission-results of these great policemen.
