

351
The answer to why could possibly be the most urgently important knowledge to come from what presently stands as the brutal, purposeless murder of a man who, no matter ones personal political beliefs, was contributing his intellect and sincerity toward a world peace in a very real and hopefully lasting manner.

People in general are very susceptible when even the hint of insanity is involved in murder, to slough off any real introspection as to causes and any concerted positive action, to reduce probability of recurrence. I had hoped, frankly, after the fact that Mr. Kennedy's murder would prove not to be the act of a mad-man but rather planned in cold calculation by some proponent of many HATE groups among