

Assassination Fear Fueled by Question

ROCHESTER, N.Y. (AP) — The man, who planned to go moosehunting in Canada this week, had just picked up his rifle from a gun shop. He wanted to avoid traffic on the way home, police said, so he asked another man in a downtown parking lot: "Which way is the Robert F. Kennedy motorcade coming?"

The question Tuesday touched off the theory of a possible attempt on the life of Kennedy while the Democratic candidate for U.S. senator — and brother of the late President John F. Kennedy — was campaigning here.

Police reinforced security around Kennedy and changed the route of his motorcade.

Police declined to identify the man with the rifle.

They said that, after he asked his question of Albert Horrigan Jr. 47, Horrigan ran to a nearby patrolman and told him. The questioner drove home. His license number was taken down as he left and he was traced to his home and questioned.

He said he had a new sight put on his rifle.

Warren Glad Commission Task Finished

SACRAMENTO, Calif. (AP)

— Chief Justice Earl Warren pointed to a famous photograph of Mr. and Mrs. John F. Kennedy and sadly recalled:

"You know, I was very fond of him and a sad thing is that I just never got around to getting him to autograph this picture. But perhaps I can get Mrs. Kennedy to do so."

Warren's remarks came Tuesday as he visited old friends — two days after the report on Kennedy's assassination was made public by the commission Warren headed.

"This has been a long and depressing job," the chief justice said. "This has been a tough thing, living with this thing for 10 months, along with my other work. Certainly, I'm glad it's over."

Warren wouldn't comment further on the work of his commission, saying only, "I have made it a rule not to say anything about it. I think the report should speak for itself."

The photograph by Karsh hung on the wall of the governor's office in the Capitol where Warren sat from 1943 to 1953 as California's chief executive. A Republican, he was the only man ever elected three times as governor.

With him was his old friend Bartley W. Cavanagh, former Sacramento city manager. They plan to attend this year's baseball World Series, as they have for the past 10 years.

The chief justice said he was inclined to favor the Philadelphia Phillies for the National League pennant, but, "my judicial opinion on that race changes every day," he cautioned with a grin.
