

One Year Later: Still No Firearms Laws

WASHINGTON, Nov. 14.—Almost a year after President Kennedy was shot to death with a mail order rifle, there has not been a single law enacted by Federal, state, or major city governments to register or strictly control sale of firearms.

The anti-gun furore that followed the Nov. 22 assassination brought a flood of bills and proposals. There were 13 in one month in Congress, 35 in Massachusetts, others in Maryland, Virginia, Rhode Island, California and New York—and countless other jurisdictions down to townships.

The only measure even approaching importance was an ordinance by New York City's council barring transportation of rifles inside the city limits unless they are unloaded and cased. A handful of other communities required "waiting periods" to check records of gun buyers.

Hunters, collectors and other firearms fans consolidated into the powerful 650,000-member National Rifle Assn. have balked most of the proposals, and there is no doubt about the Association's claim that some of the anti-gun plans are "fantastic . . . out of this world."

But even the Association's own proposals have been ignored by the nation—severe penalties for crimes by armed men; firearm theft a felony in all cases; mandatory penalties for gun related-crimes.

STILL ADVERTISED

Mail-order gun ads such as the one that brought Lee Harvey Oswald and the fatal Manufacturer-Carcano 6.5 mm. rifle still crowd the pages of gun magazines.

"The National Rifleman" for November, ironically, has three advertisements for Manufacturer-Carcano, the one used to kill the President. All available manufacturers and factory representatives of shooting equip-regarded magazine carries a full page advertisement for mail order guns by the firm from which Oswald bought his gun.

The major bill considered in Congress since the President's assassination is one by Sen. Thomas J. Dodd (D.-Conn.) it would require a mail-order house to notify local police when a person buys a gun.

The bill—a watered down version of a previous Dodd proposal—died in the Senate Commerce Committee. Dodd will reintroduce it in January.

The bill, while short of the registration and permit requirements that some police seek, would at least let law enforcement men know who in the community is getting a gun by mail order.

THE OWNERS

At present, an estimated 30-400,000 people in the U. S. own guns.

On the state level Massachusetts—the late President's home—led the list in new proposals. But the 35 bills all failed, partially because support was disorganized and opposition was well-organized behind the National Rifle Association and related groups.

In California, the Assembly Interim Committee on Criminal Procedure is studying the gun problem and is to report back to the 1965 session.

The Rifle Assn. has circularized its members and clubs saying "this hearing could be of vital importance to you and to your right to keep guns! . . . dealers, distributors, manufacturers and factory representatives of shooting equipment and accessories could be greatly affected . . ." The association urges a letter writing, wiring and personal visit campaign to all members of the committee.

But the anti-gun camp—utterly unorganized as it is—has not given up. Only about 25 of the 50 state legislatures met this year, thus there are many where the battle of gun laws has not been joined. Some 47 out of the 50 meet in 1965 and the NRA's highly efficient legislative division is already assembling ammunition.

Present federal laws require registration of fully automatic firearms and short-barreled shotguns and rifles. They bar interstate shipment of guns to felons and keep pistols out of the mails under most conditions, but not out of common carriers.

Abroad, Japan bars handguns to all but police. Registration is required in Canada, Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Sweden, Belgium, The Netherlands, Norway, Denmark, Austria, Roumania, Spain and Japan.

But in the U. S. Constitution—and in the constitutions of 35 states—the peoples' right to bear arms is guaranteed. This has been a key argument by the Rifle Association, and to some extent by such groups as the American Legion, the National Wildlife Federation, the Izaak Walton League and others including weapons and ammunition manufacturers.
