It appears clear that the 16th Department, SCD, KGB did not operate against the American Embassy in Moscow. It is possible that in their work against black market operators in Moscow, the 16th Department could become aware of American Embassy personnel engaged in black market activities; however, any recruitments of such personnel would be handled by the 1st (American) Department, SCD, KGB and the Chief and Deputy Chief of the 1st (American Embassy) Section, 1st Department, SCD, KGB would be aware of such operations. "SAMMY" was Deputy Chief of the 1st Section in 1960-1961. NYO is requested to submit its comments concerning whether or not [redacted] was sufficiently knowledgeable of the functions and operations of the various departments of the SCD to have recognized this apparent discrepancy in information furnished to him by [redacted].

'In Recent Years the System' has Betrayed Signs of Strain in a Notorious Series of Currency Crises

IMF: A Quarter Century Appraisal

See addendum
Classified by 190-79-1074
Declassify on: OADR

(Following are excerpts of an address, "Bretton Woods, Twenty-Five Years After," delivered last month by International Monetary Fund Managing Director Pierre-Paul Schweitzer, at Queens University, Kingston, Ontario.)

By Pierre-Paul Schweitzer

Like most revolutions, the movement which culminated at Bretton Woods in July, 1944, was the product of its time. Three main considerations motivated the pioneers of that movement. These were, first a realization that, as a result of the War, the international economy had been violently disrupted; secondly, a fear that after the War the vicious cycle of boom and slump would be repeated; and, thirdly, a recognition that to cope with these problems much greater international cooperation would be necessary than had prevailed before 1939.

How severely the War was breaking up the established economic relationships became increasingly clear as it went on. By 1944 the signs were unmistakable. Only the United States and Canada among the major trading nations of the prewar world showed promise of emerging with little economic hurt. Continental Europe was a scene of widespread devastation; Japan too was crumbling; and the United Kingdom had spent practically all its reserves and run up massive debts to pay for essential imports. Despite the relief afforded by Lend-Lease, World War II had carried much further the transference of economic power across the Atlantic.

There was a common fear that, as after World War I, a brief boom would be followed by a disastrous slump. By 1920 wholesale prices in most European countries were more than three times as high as they had been in 1913. Within the next two years these prices had fallen by 50 per cent. Not until 1925 had world trade surpassed its prewar level, and only a few precarious years of prosperity supervened before the onset of the Great Depression.

Stable Employment

Partly as a result of this disaster, governments in the thirties were beginning to place a high and stable level of employment in the forefront of their policy aims. The first effects of this preoccupation, however, had been to stimulate economic nationalism. Competition for exports had led to chaos in the exchanges, as country after country devalued in the hope of undercutting its neighbors. The paroxysms of exchange restrictions, multiple rates and fluctuating currencies proliferated. It may be claimed that these devices served as a support for domestic recovery programs, but a high price was paid in terms of uncertainty and international disruption.

Little had been done by way of cooperation to repair the fragmentation of the world economy. The most ambitious attempt was the Tripartite Agreement in 1936, which was prompted by the devaluation of the French franc and sought to concert among its members safeguards against the effects of any further devaluations. But it had no means of enforcement and no separate organization to give it permanence; and it was of little consequence.

So it was that the countries that came together in 1942 and 1943 to prepare the way for Bretton Woods brought to their discussions a common determination to adopt a code of financial conduct in the international sphere which would outlaw competitive depreciation of exchange rates, a common recognition that international financial assistance would be needed to assist countries to abide by this code, and a readiness to relinquish some part of national authority in the interests of the international community as a whole.

Embodiment of Principles

The International Monetary Fund was created as the embodiment of these principles. We may now look back across twenty-five years to appraise the handiwork of its founders and to see what lessons intervening experience holds for the future conduct of international monetary management. If I dwell rather on the weaknesses associated with the system created at Bretton Woods, I do not mean to disparage its achievements, which are recognizably outstanding.

The dream of Bretton Woods—or, as many cynics were to say for more than a decade after the conference, the illusion of Bretton Woods—was the unrestricted convertibility for current transactions of at least the major currencies. This became a reality some ten years ago and in many cases was extended also to capital transfers. The real output of the membership of the Fund, their trade in goods and services, and the flow of investment capital among them have expanded beyond all expectations and with barely any interruption.

The achievements of the system and of the related revolution in national policies have changed our whole way of describing the economic climate. We talk much less of the business cycle, much more of rates of growth in real income. Insofar as the economies of member countries are still subject to cyclical phenomena, we no longer describe these in the terms used 30 years ago—"prosperity and depression." The problems have been transposed to a different key and we speak now of "overheating" and—occasionally—"recession."

PIERRE-PAUL SCHWEITZER
... I.M.F. Managing Director

Yet in recent years the system has betrayed signs of strain in a notorious series of currency crises. Less spectacular but more ominous have been the introduction in some cases of restrictions on current transactions, the tinkering with border taxes, the reimposition or tightening of capital controls and the sluggish growth of aid. These developments have given rise to a keen debate on the adequacy of the system established a generation ago. As I said, I propose tonight to concentrate on those aspects of the system where performance has been less satisfactory. In that context, I shall deal first with exchange rates, secondly with the adjustment process, and thirdly with the provision of adequate reserves.

The current controversy has centered chiefly on the exchange rate regime. It has been seriously questioned whether the par value system is not unduly rigid and outmoded in the present world. This system was intended to provide a stable environment which, by encouraging commercial interchange, would stimulate the growth and sharpen the efficiency of the world economy and its constituent parts. Stability, as the Fund has stressed in the past, does not mean rigidity. Specific provision was written into the Articles of Agreement for changes in par values; and where countries—in deficit or surplus—can no longer maintain broad equilibrium over time in their external payments without having to incur undue unemployment or price inflation, it is wholly proper that this provision should be used.

Yet in some instances, despite the existence of this provision, exchange rates that had ceased to be appropriate have been maintained. And this has contributed to the persistence of payments disequilibria, the encouragement of speculation and crises in the exchange markets. Moreover, the rigidity of exchange rates in this sense has sometimes led to corrective measures of a kind that deny the very purposes which the par value system seeks to promote.

It is also true that the present framework differs in at least one important aspect from the world envisaged when the Articles of the Fund were agreed. The drafters were well aware that a country might have to alter its exchange rate in response to relative changes in its real economic position.

But they did not envisage that a country would have to be so much concerned about the public's changing views on the strength of its currency. Speculative capital movements were to be suppressed rather than financed; indeed, limitations were put on members' access to the Fund to finance capital outflows. While the liberalization of payments for capital transactions has been a major factor in bringing about an integrated world economy, it has also greatly increased the possibility of sudden pressures on exchange rates, notably when underlying economic developments gives reason to suppose that an adjustment would be appropriate.

New Flexibility

The strains thus experienced by the system have led to suggestions that it might function better if there were more room for exchange rates to change. Various possibilities have been advocated for various kinds of flexibility intended either to facilitate adjustment in the basic balance of payments or to provide more incentive for equilibrating speculation or to combine these two objectives in some degree.

These suggestions deserve careful study in the full context of the achievements of the present system, of its weaknesses to be sure, but also of the grave disturbances of which the drafters at Bretton Woods still had the most immediate and vivid recollections. It is true that the world's financial system has been badly rocked in the last few years; and it would be foolish to minimize these disturbances. But it is also true that they have been overwhelmingly financial, not economic, in kind.

It seems to me that the essential characteristics of the par value system remain valid now as they were twenty-five years ago. Stability of exchange rates has made a key contribution to the balanced expansion of the world economy. The major advance toward international cooperation in the economic field that was achieved at Bretton Woods was that the rate of exchange for each currency was made a matter of international concern.

It is only by bringing exchange rates under international jurisdiction that the risk of competitive depreciation and other forms of currency warfare can be avoided. It is true that since the end of the War this risk has not manifested itself as a serious one; but this experience at least partly reflects the success of the Bretton Woods system and in no wise justifies dismantling the protection provided by the Articles of the Fund.

Anarchic Practices

In this connection I should like to make one very general point. Governments have in the postwar period increasingly accepted responsibility for the performance of their national economies in terms of employment, output, price stability and other major economic variables. The rate of exchange has a major impact on all these aspects and is bound to be politically sensitive. In my view, it is therefore unrealistic to suppose that governments would be prepared to accept alternative regimes that would put the rate of exchange at the mercy of market forces alone. Almost certainly, rates would continue to be managed and common rules would have to be agreed to forestall any possibility of reversion to anarchic practices. It is at least open to doubt, however, whether generally acceptable criteria could be worked out in this area.

I believe that any case for change must be convincingly made in light of the interrelated aims—growth and stability—which any system should serve.

Although I have so far dwelt almost exclusively on exchange rates, it would of course be wrong to consider this matter in isolation. Changes in exchange rates are one element in the broader mechanism that has come to be called the adjustment process. In certain circumstances rate changes are an indispensable condition for the correction of economic maladjustment but even so they are part only of what must be a concerted attack on that problem.

The Fund is very much concerned with the adjustment process as Article I makes plain. One of the purposes of the Fund, in accordance with its other objectives is "... to shorten the duration and lessen the degree of disequilibrium in the international balances of payments of members." It is inevitable that countries should from time to time develop deficits or surpluses in their external payments; and it is important for the member concerned and, in the case of the main trading countries, for the system as a whole that these should be contained and corrected within a reasonable period of time and in a manner consistent with the other objectives of the Fund. Unfortunately members' imbalances have not always been notable for the brevity of their duration or the modesty of

See BRETON, H2, Col. 1

IMF Was a 'Product of Its Time'

BRETTON, From H1

their size. The long-standing deficits of the United States and the United Kingdom and the surpluses of some continental European nations are serious cases in point.

Against this background some commentators have argued that the international community should formulate and adopt uniform rules for financial policy to introduce an element of automaticity into the adjustment process. That approach tends to underrate the complexities of this world. In seeking to achieve simultaneously a variety of economic objectives of differing degree of compatibility, countries need leeway to apply that combination of policies which is best calculated to overcome their particular difficulties and takes account also of the range of instruments at their disposal.

A mechanistic formula, even if it were operationally feasible or politically acceptable, would inhibit this flexibility of response. At the same time there can be no question that, in the pursuit of their domestic objectives, countries should give adequate weight to the evolution of their external payments. This means that countries should be prepared to coordinate and temper their economic policies in light of the implications that these have for other countries and the world economy.

Fruitful Interchange

The responsibilities of surplus and deficit countries in the adjustment process have been extensively discussed in the Fund and in Working Party 3 of the OECD. This interchange has been fruitful in identifying problems of common concern and in increasing understanding as to appropriate responses. Having said this, I am bound to add that there remains a gap between understanding and practice. This stems partly from imperfections in economic diagnosis and forecasting. At the same time the tools for implementing policy are often cumbersome to use and lacking in precision when applied.

Yet, after due allowance is made for such difficulties, there remains a basic problem which is political in nature and which has not infrequently impeded prompt and appropriate action. It consists broadly in a reluctance to dampen down excessive aggregate demand until the inflationary process has caused substantial damage; and also in an unwillingness to make necessary adjustments in exchange rates not simply for reasons of national prestige but also because this is no easy option in terms of its effect on the real income of particular sectors of the community.

It is not readily apparent to me how this problem, in light of its nature, can be resolved simply by changing the monetary system. To the extent that political will is engaged, it seems necessary that countries should accept that timely action is in their own self-interest in all but the very shortest term. It may be that this is being, or will become, more widely recognized as a result of experience over the last several years. If the chaos of the 'thirties could be followed by the incomparably more responsible approach of the postwar period, I am inclined to believe that the improvement can be carried further.

New Encouragement

It is possible to take encouragement from the fact that countries have made and are making the effort to adjust. The two major deficit countries of past year, the United States and the United Kingdom, have shown much determination in this respect. To improve the severe imbalance in the system, however, persistent action on their part will be necessary for some long while ahead. At the same time the policy reactions of a wide range of other countries will be hardly less important. As the United States and the United Kingdom move into surplus, the payments positions of many other countries will become less easy.

This expectation has been confirmed by developments in the first quarter of 1969. During this period the United States, although in record deficit on the liquidity basis, had a large surplus on official settlements account; and the United Kingdom also was running a moderate over-all surplus. This situation had an immediate impact on the payments and reserve positions of a number of industrial countries and began to provoke certain defensive reactions.

These recent developments underline an essential requirement of the international monetary system which, though understood by some at Bretton Woods, was not provided for in the structure that emerged. This is the need for a continuing accrual over the longer run of global reserves in a quantity sufficient to permit countries that conduct their international transactions in a responsible fashion to increase their reserves adequately as those transactions expand.

This need was satisfied in the earlier years of the system created at Bretton

Woods, although it would perhaps be too generous to say that its architects had clearly foreseen how this aspect would work. The increase in reserves during the 'fifties through the early 'sixties was not statistically very large. The annual rate of growth was about 2½ per cent as against an increase of trade in the order of 6 or 7 per cent a year. The main explanation for the fact that reserve growth was nevertheless adequate is found in the massive redistribution of reserves that took place during the period.

Decline in Stock

The United States especially, and a number of developing countries, that had ended the War with very large accumulated reserves could well afford an absolute decline in their stock. The small amount held by foreign countries in the form of claims on the United States could readily be expanded without hesitation on the part of debtor or creditor. These adjustments together with accruals of newly mined gold permitted the combined reserves of countries outside the United States to grow roughly in proportion to the expansion of their trade. In these circumstances countries were able to sustain that rapid expansion, to liberalize current and—in many cases—capital transactions and to devote resources to assisting developing countries.

The process of reserve growth that I have just outlined ceased to function some five years ago. Such reserve growth as there has been since then—and it has been small—has been in the form of monetized credits to countries in balance of payments deficit. It is clear that this is no basis for the long-run growth of world reserves.

Fortunately the imagination which twenty-five years ago produced the Articles of Agreement of the Fund has not been wanting in recent years. The proposed Amendment to the Articles provides a constructive solution to the need for deliberate reserve creation that is now materializing as the traditional process ceases to function. The discussions and negotiations that preceded agreement on the special drawing rights facility were protracted and by no means easy. Nevertheless, I think that we can take some satisfaction in the fact that a procedure has been worked out and will soon be available to meet an emerging defect of the system, without the world economy having had to provide the proof, through large-scale misery and dislocation, that adequate reserves are the required lubricant of that system.

In addition, NOSENKO, in the presence of Mr. BRUCE SOLIE, the CIA officer who has sat in on most of the interviews by WFO Agents, volunteered his services to the Bureau. He explained that he is not fond of desk work and always wanted "action." He stated that he felt that he met people easily and could quickly assess and evaluate people. While assigned to the KGB, he was active in operations contacting sources and informants and directing activities. Even when he became a Section Chief and later Deputy Chief of Department, he actively participated in operations. He stated that due to his past experience and his background, he felt certain that he could be of use to the Bureau, particularly in the field of assessing and evaluating people. He suggested that the Bureau may have a special interest in Soviets assigned to this country or might be able to use him against subjects of Russian background or to assess sources concerning whom the Bureau may have some doubts as to their bona fides. He emphasized that he would follow instructions explicitly and would take no independent action. (u)

In response to questions NOSENKO stated that in his opinion the KGB, during the first two or three years after his defection, would have desired to liquidate him but thereafter his liquidation would operate to the detriment of KGB. He also was of the opinion that things are changing in the Soviet Union which would reduce the possibility of KGB desires to liquidate him. He also was of the opinion that KGB would not make any attempt to recruit him for operational activity within the United States although he considers this a possibility. He stated that he had no fear of making contact with Soviet officials assigned to or visiting this country to assess them or to make recruitment pitches to them. He emphasized that he would be completely at the disposal of the Bureau and would carry out any action desired of him. (u)

NOSENKO was thanked for his offer of cooperation and advised his offer would be given serious consideration. WFO will discuss this matter with Mr. BRUCE SOLIE and will subsequently submit recommendations to the Bureau. (u)

Re Washington Field letters, 7/22/69, 7/25/69 and 7/30/69. (S)(4)

Relets referred to an apparent discrepancy in information furnished by [redacted] and that furnished by "SAMMY"
concerning [redacted] (S)

A review of the information furnished by [redacted] concerning [redacted] confirms in substance what was set out in re
Washington Field letter dated 7/22/69. [redacted] was reporting information told to him by his friend, [redacted]. It should be noted that none of this information comes from first-hand knowledge of [redacted] but was obtained by him from [redacted] (S)

Concerning [redacted] claim that he had accompanied a [redacted] to the US in 1960, it is noted that the NYO questioned [redacted] on at least two subsequent occasions regarding this as no record could be located for such travel by [redacted] (S) When asked if [redacted] could have used another name for this travel, [redacted] stated he believed [redacted] would have used his true name. (S)(4)

Photographs of other Soviet nationals with similar first and middle names were shown to [redacted] but he stated they were not identical with [redacted] and reiterated that [redacted] told him he had been in the US in 1960 [redacted] (S)

Concerning [redacted] who was in the US in 1960 with a [redacted] followed essentially the same schedule here as [redacted] told he did, it is noted that [redacted] stated he had observed [redacted] on two occasions and that [redacted] had said [redacted] was [redacted] (S)

[redacted] described the function of the 16th Department, SCD, as having the responsibility for providing security within the Committee on Atomic Energy in the Soviet Union and, on another occasion, stated the 16th Department, SCD, had the responsibility for working against the members of the diplomatic corps of foreign countries who were stationed in Moscow. This apparent discrepancy was not further explored with [redacted] (S)

Regarding the recruitment of the three American Embassy employees, [redacted] told [redacted] that he had personally been rewarded, as a result of these accomplishments, in his supervisory position in the 16th Department. (S)

[redacted] (S)

This situation poses several possibilities:

1. Either "SAMMY" or [redacted] is mistaken as to the number of the Department having security responsibilities for the Soviet atomic energy program in 1960. In this regard, the NYO feels that certainly "SAMMY" has first-hand knowledge and it is possible that [redacted] may have inadvertently recalled [redacted] telling him that he, [redacted] was with the 16th Department instead of the 12th Department. [redacted] knew very little concerning the organizational set-up and division of responsibilities within the SCD and if the discrepancy involved the personal knowledge of [redacted] as opposed to that of "SAMMY", the NYO would have to go along with "SAMMY". 2. [redacted] (S) (u) may have travelled to the US in 1960, as he claims, under another name. There have been several instances of the Soviets utilizing this technique for reasons known only to them. This point could be resolved very easily, if [redacted] were available for contact, by exhibiting the photograph of the pertinent visiting [redacted] (S)

[redacted] (S) to him. "SAMMY" can be of no help in this regard as neither [redacted] is known to him. Accordingly, we face an impasse on this point insofar as [redacted] and "SAMMY" are concerned. (S) (u)

3. [redacted] (S) (u) may have falsely told [redacted] that he had travelled to the US in 1960. This does not seem valid, however, as there is no logical reason for [redacted] (S) to do so even though it would be logical for someone with [redacted] responsibilities re the Soviet atomic energy program to make such a trip as did the [redacted] in 1960. (S) (u)

4. [redacted] (S) may have "colored" the information he furnished to [redacted], as suggested by Washington Field, particularly as to his receipt of an award for his part in the recruitment of the three Americans. Again, however, no logical purpose can be perceived for such action on [redacted] (S) part. (S) (u)

The NYO suggests as a possible solution to the question of [redacted] putative travel to the US in 1960, that Washington Field compare [redacted] photograph with those of the members of the visiting [redacted] (S) WFO file [redacted] (S) Bufile [redacted] (S) in an effort to determine if any member of that delegation might be identical with [redacted] (S) (u)
