Anniversary to be ashamed of: The Warren Commission report

S UNDAY marked the 25th anniversary of a great and murky evasion: the release of the Warren Commission report on the assassination of President John F. Kennedy.

On that date, in a classic White House Rose Garden photo opportunity, Chief Justice Earl Warren hand-delivered a bound copy of the report to a somber President Lyndon B. _____ Johnson.

The commission's final product, a 900page tome with 26 volumes of testimony and exhibits, was immedi-= ately touted by the government and the press as both comprehensive and definitive. Nearly one year after Dallas, the American people could rest easily again. The "Crime of the Century" was solved.

It was a_therapeutic but hollow day. Over the past 25 years the initial credibility assigned to the Warren report has fallen into tatters. The report's assumptions and conclusions have been ingeniously attacked by private citizens, revised significantly in 1979 by the House Select Committee on Assassinations and generally dismissed by a skeptical public. Its finding are widely regarded as transparently biased and politically motivated. The nation, its confidence in governmental integrity eroded, still has no satisfactory resolution to the mystery in Dallas.

At the heart of the confusion linger grave questions as to why Warren and the other commissioners - men of national stature - signed off on a report that willfully refused to confront the essential facts of the Kennedy assassination. While we may never know the full truth about Dallas, a large collection of government documents throws light on the internal workings of the commission. The documents - readily available through the Freedom of Information Act but ignored for years by the mainstream press - help to reveal why the commission decided to conspire with the administration and the FBI in falsifying our national history.

To be fair to the Warren Commission and its legal staff, the "solution" to the Kennedy assassination was fabricated at the highest reaches of government before the commission was even constituted. Just two or three days after Dallas, the White House and FBI worked out a politically acceptable solution - that JFK was killed by a lonenut gunman with vague pro-communist sympathies. President Johnson, in collaboration with FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, apparently decided that an open and unfettered investigation was not in the national interest. The contrived version of the assassination quickly took bureaucratic form in an FBI secret report (commission document 1, or CD-1) completed around Dec. 6 and transmitted to the Warren Commission only three days later. In a little over three weeks, the redoubtable Hoover and his FBI had solved the case.

In summary, CD-1 concluded that Oswald was the lone assassin and there was no evidence of conspiracy. Thrown together in haste, CD-1 contained less than 450 words on the murder itself, omitted a wound in Kennedy's throat and ignored a missed shot that struck a bystander. Anyone who undertakes a fair evaluation of CD-1 cannot escape the conclusion that Hoover and the FBI had no idea what happened in Dallas on Nov. 22, 1963.

Warren Commission members soon became very aware that they were being manipulated. Their work was already done for them and they merely had to ratify a predetermined solution. This shock of recognition was dramatically reflected in the commission's executive session of Jan. 22, 1964, in which J. Lee Rankin, the general counsel, objects to CD-1's conclusion that Oswald worked alone and that there was no conspiracy:

Rankin: "In my experience with the FBI they don't do that. They claim they don't evaluate, and it is uniform prior experience they don't do that. Secondly, they have not run out all kinds of leads in Mexico or in Russia and so forth . . ."

Commission member Allen W. Dulles replied by expressing puzzlement over the FBI's rush to judgment in CD-1. But Congressman Hale Boggs understood Rankin's line of thinking:

Boggs: "I can immediately . . ."

Rankin: "They would like to have us fold up and quit."

Boggs: "This closes the case, you see. Don't you see?"

Dulles: "Yes, I see that." Rankin: "They found the man. There is nothing more to do. The commission supports their conclusions, and we can go home and that is the end of it."

Clearly distressed, Dulles requested that all records of this session be destroyed. Warren reluctantly agreed. However, the day's conversations did survive, only because a stray stenographic tape escaped erasure.

The Jan. 22 and 27 executive sessions attest further to the commissioners' disbelief that Oswald was the lone assassin and to their collective shock that the FBI wanted them to engage in a coverup. In fact, before the Warren Commission called its first witness or examined any of the physical evidence, it was being boxed in, manipulated and pressured to accept the White House/FBI version of the Kennedy assassination.

The Warren Commission acquiesced to this pressure and spent the remaining nine months behind closed doors attempting to reconcile the bitter reality with a public report that had to be made before the American electorate went to the polls in November. The commission was powerless to battle this kind of intimidation without igniting a devastating confrontation that may have shaken the country. Therefore, it quickly aligned itself with the official mythology of the assassination.

Truth, in short, became irrelevant in the investigation of the assassination of an American president. Almost from the outset, the compliant Warren Commission conducted its business in a murky Orwellian world of secrecy, suppression and obfuscation. It perverted the American system of law and justice by accepting a cynical and corrupt operating principle: verdict first, trial to follow.
