The controversy over pro tection of the President is no expected to involve how the services's White House detai handles physical attacks. Se curity experts in both the Se cret Service and other Federa agencies agreed that the swif response of special agen Larry M. Buendorf in grabbing the woman's gun was, as one put it, "a textbook case of ar alert security officer.'

"The question is why way that girl allowed to get within two feet of the President al all," one agent of the Federa Bureau of Investigation said He and several other intelligence and law enforcement officials asked not to be quoted by name because they did not want "in any way" to disrupt the investigation and prosecution.

In the late nineteen-sixties and early nineteen-seventies, Federal law enforcement offi-cials said, these instances might well have resulted in the creation of a dossier on Miss Fromme as a political dissident and a possible danger. But now, they argue, the pressure of civil libertarians has made Federal agencies bare their records to only specific crimes or threats. The Secret Service keeps files on 47,000 persons who are considered potential threats to the President and other high-ranking officials. Its officials have testified that though the list contains the names of "political dissidents" they are not there for their political views but because of "some other disruptive activity." "some

The Secret Service has been particularly sensitive about an operation called "watchbird," which is a periodic check on the whereabouts and status of persons who have made threats against the President. This operation is not connected with any given Presidential trip, but is an effort to keep track of a hard core of persons believed to be a substantial threat to the safety of the President.
