Claude Monet (1840–1926)

Claude Monet was the most natural — and prolific — of landscape painters, and his name is virtually synonymous with Impressionism. Born in 1840 of a wealthy mercantile family in Le Havre, Monet was cut off financially by his father following his decision to become an artist. Yet, after two decades of intermittent struggle in the 1860's and 1870's, he became a wealthy landowner, and, at his death in 1926, his estate far surpassed that of his father.

Monet's paintings represent the world of a middle class Parisian of his generation. His landscapes, quivering with light and wind, are those of the Ile de France and the bathing resorts of the north coast favored by Parisians. His Italy, his Norway, and his England show us their monuments and sites as viewed by the typical tourist he was. Yet, for all the banality of his subjects, his paintings are among the most brilliant in the history of art. His love of the medium led to a restless search for scumbled, freely applied paint surfaces which became skeins of color upon color. And Monet's desire to paint the fleeting moments when light passes suddenly over form resulted eventually in a method of painting in which he worked simultaneously on several canvases, each representing a different "effect".

The Art Institute of Chicago has a glorious collection of Monet's paintings largely because one important patron, Bertha Honoré Palmer, was among the first and greatest collectors of his work. By the time of the International Exhibition in Chicago in 1893, there were as many works by Monet in private collections of this city as there were in Paris, and this early trend in Monet collecting persists to this day.

This calendar celebrates Monet's surfaces, and the plates take each viewer "into" the rich and variable textures of his paintings. Once

"in" a Monet painting, the viewer can quite easily lose his grasp of the subject. Yet, it must always be remembered that Monet was not an abstract — or even a proto-abstract — painter and that all his varied surfaces were made to capture the real effects of light on form.
