Dear Sylvia,

I have been wondering how things are going with you but have refrained from bothering you with a phone call. I hope that events will put us back into contact, since I truly enjoyed the conversations we had. Though they were mainly concerned with one topic of overriding interest to us both, I felt that we would have a rapport on many other topics as well. I had the same feeling about Vince Salandria. I hope someday to be able to return the professional--as well as the purely social--favors I received from you both.

I have written to Dr. Wecht, proposing that we collaborate in editing a book of collected essays by professional experts on various aspects of the assassination and investigation, but so far I have had no reply. It would be a rather big task, I believe, since we would have to start from scratch; none of the professional articles already written and published are of the caliber I would want for the book.

What did you think of the Ramparts article? My own reaction was very favorable: it showed signs of very careful research. But of course it is difficult to forget their earlier travesties. Have you had any recent word on when Weisberg III will appear?

I hope you have been well and that we will have occasion before too long to get together again.
