Dear Professor Kaplan,

The current issue of The American Scholar has just come to my attention and I greatly appreciate your kind reference to the Subject Index. I am enclosing an errata sheet, which you may find useful. Unfortunately, the publishers were disinclined to distribute the errata (as they are disinclined to publish a second edition, now that the first printing of the Index is exhausted); so I have tried to send a copy to users of the Index whenever I learn of them.

Also enclosed is a copy of a self-explanatory letter to the Editor of The Oakland Tribune.

Rather belatedly, I should like to tell you that I greatly admired your book, The Trial of Jack Ruby. It was not only an absorbing account of the human and forensic drama but a major contribution to the literature of the assassination and related events.

Yours very sincerely,
