Dear Mr. Wolff:

I am sending you a second copy of my letter to you dated August 30, in the hope that you have not answered it because somehow it failed to reach you. If it did reach you and you had decided not to reply, I would hope that you would reconsider that decision.

I hope that you do not feel that the purpose of my letter was to cross-examine you or intimidate you. Your letter showed genuine concern, and you indicated that you wanted me to respond to it. I felt that you had made some persuasive points in your letter, however there were many basic questions which remained, and there seemed to be some rather persuasive contradictions as well. You mentioned that you were a busy man and that you had spent an entire morning writing the letter. I too am extremely busy. I am an evening student two nights a week, I hold a full time job during the day, and I have spent considerable time of late in exhaustive research on my New York Times article -- a project which is now nearly completed. I took the time to write you as I did because I retained what I felt were reasonable questions, and because your letter indicated to me that you were a decent person with whom I could establish a dialogue. If I felt otherwise I would not have wasted the time. If you feel that my reply to you and the questions I posed were unfair, leading, or reflected bias I would honestly like to know. Quite obviously I have a bias on the subject of which I am writing, or I would not be writing about it. Nevertheless, I would like to think that I maintain my objectivity.

If I receive no reply to this letter I will not trouble you further. I hope, however, that this will not be the case.

Sincerely,

Gerald Policoff
