Dear Professor Popkin,

Thank you very much for your letter of the 25th. I should certainly be delighted to have an opportunity to discuss the case with you when you return from Europe. Perhaps by next February the situation will have changed—at least, the recent proposals by Richard Goodwin offer some hope of that.

I am very happy to know that the Subject Index is of some use, although I am increasingly conscious of its imperfections. I finished it just about a year ago and in the interval have encountered a number of references that should have been included. I am enclosing an errata sheet (in case you did not receive the one I provided to Mr. Silvers) and suggest that you write the additional citations right on the pages of the Index. I am sending one also to the British Museum. (X)

The astonishing thing about the Hearings and Exhibits is that they continue to produce new nuggets of information, even upon third and fourth reading. As one becomes increasingly familiar with the infinite convolutions of the evidence, items which one did not appreciate upon first reading sometimes take on special significance.

Incidentally, General Walker seems to have negative feelings about my Index. He wrote me demanding to know why I had classified him under "right-wingers and neo-nazis" and why I had not included a classification "left-wingers and neo-nazis".

Another interesting letter came from Wesley J. Liebaler, to the editor of The Minority of One, requesting a copy of the issue which contains my review of Inquest—interesting because he explicitly requested it in his capacity of former assistant counsel to the Commission. I am not sure what to make of that.

I thought you might like to look at some of the press coverage on your article; I am enclosing some of the clippings, which you might return eventually, if convenient. One day I should like to do a study of press coverage of criticism of the Warren Report by the "second-generation" critics—although it does not appear that the necessary time for such side trips will ever be available.

With all good wishes,

Yours sincerely,
