

Sites of Penetrations by Bullets

Doctors treating Gov. George C. Wallace said he was struck by four and possibly five bullets. The areas shown in the accompanying diagram indicate the approximate locations of the bullet penetrations.

One bullet, the doctors said, passed through the upper right arm (1) and another through the right forearm (2). One or both of two wounds in the chest (3 and 4) are thought to have been possibly caused by bullets that passed through the arm first.

Wounds in the right shoulder (5) and left shoulder blade (6) were superficial and evidently the bullets causing them did not lodge in the body. A bullet is lodged against the first lumbar vertebra (7), just below the ribs, and is presumed to be the cause of the present paralysis in Governor Wallace's legs.

The New York Times/May 17, 1972