Dear Anne,

Thanks for the return of the DeLoach record and for the suggestions.

Partly I do not have that kind of ego and partly I've done it and more recently, when a high school history teacher and a history professor asked I agreed to be taped.

When Hood's president and several others were here to inspect what they are getting she exclaimed to the others, "we have to do oral histories with this man!" and then gave nobody the time. This summer they did six on the JFK work, though.

With that in mind, and having turned down an offer from a friend to pay for the printing of an autobiography, when there was no writing I could think of that did not require access to the records I really do not have access to, in writing to ^{friends} fields when I reminisced, I started keeping copies. I had not thought of that earlier

In addition to that, in beginning "Inside the JFK Assassination Industry," which I paid aside for Posner, I have what is unread and I imagine is a pedestrian selection of what substituted for what is not taught that prepared me for the work I've done, I've some of that.

What I intended limiting myself to is what were different kinds of learning experiences. I also had in mind that if it ever were to be published, young people might realize that much of life is or can be of learning experiences, if they recall what they should have learned.

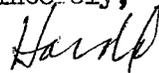

On Posner as the shyster, one of the ways I refer to him, years ago, when it became apparent that I'd be limited in what I could do and much might be impossible, I decided that the best use I can make of the time that remains to me is to try to perfect the record for history to the degree possible for me.

I began the two books that are to be published next year with the intent of recording those aspects of those histories, the second on Posner. The first, which I regard as more important, is being delayed for the second.

The word you used is "fun" and indeed reliving some of it was that. Not all, but yes, some.

We both wish you and your ~~mother~~ mother the best of holidays,

Sincerely,

Harold Weisberg
