Ubiquitous Bugs and Our Privacy do it even better now and so, presumably, do the Russians. beam experiments and microcircuitry and parabolic mikes, we dropping had long since rendered them obsolescent. With laser ently worked; but fantastic progress in the dark art of eavesamounted to little more than "an old system of crystal sets." ging procedures had for about 12 years been overlooking what were dismayed to find that their highly sophisticated antibugof the walls of the American Embassy in Moscow recently, they Disdain was tempered by the fact that the "crystal sets" appar-When security men dug some 40 tiny microphones out up to the lip of a legal cliff. case evidence, the police trying to snag a criminal. Technology mon nusance. . . ." The technology has also forced us right the eaves of a house, to hearken after discourse . . . are a com-"Eaves-droppers, or such as listen under walls or windows or in his monumental Commentaries on English law wrote flatly beyond the comprehension of old Sir William Blackstone, who has made the job of prying into other people's business easy far spies, the blackmailers, the private detectives looking for divorce For that matter, so do the corporate snoopers, the business ciety of such gadgets as: three-day conference intended to assess the impact on our so-The New York City Bar Association has just completed a diameter, which can be hidden in an air duct or light fixture. A television camera, only eight inches long and an inch in

> A radio transmitter, including battery and microphone up to half a mile. which is no bigger than a cigaret lighter and can send a signal

▶ A contact bug, little larger than a postage stamp, which can be clapped up against a door to hear what is going on inside the room.

ducting "unreasonable searches." than the state itself would be capable of or interested in conics, nor could they conceive of a society where any agency other more able than Blackstone to envision the marvels of electronseizures," effective laws to back it up are notoriously lacking right "to be secure . . . against unreasonable searches and vacy. Although the Fourth Amendment specifically defends the use plainly places in jeopardy our traditional notions of pri largely because the men who framed that amendment were no Such devices and many more are widely available and their

Maria and the second second and so far this too has been left mostly up to policemen on is the question of what constitutes privacy and its violations apply chiefly to wiretapping, and the existing legal situation tee, says, "You can't adopt the 'take-a-law-Miss-Jones' approach." Present state laws (the federal law is a useless antique) the one hand and scare-artists on the other. bugs-are a fraction of the total problem. Much more basic requesting new legislation as "chaotic; the right to privacy is hampered unduly." Yet wiretapping-and the more elegant not being protected and law enforcement agencies are being has been described by Attorney General Robert Kennedy in Ruebhausen, chairman of the Bar Association study commit-What is clearly required are some new laws, but as Oscar M to do something about the good judge's complaint. group, 62 years later, deserves our thanks for bravely trying are, if any; how or when the right is invaded or infringed, or what remedy can be applied, if any." The Bar Association precision what the right of privacy is or what its limitations served that "It is quite impossible to define with anything like Away back in 1902, Judge Denis O'Brien of New York ob