Lessons of the CIA Mess

Practically no one, from the Administration on down, comes out of the current Central Intelligence Agency flap looking good. Though it is too early to assess the damage, it is plainly considerable. The CIA has again been confirmed in its role as fall guy and fair game for rebels and antiestablishmentarians of every stripe. Actually, the agency has done pretty well at what it is supposed to do: produce intelligence. Its blunders—the Bay of Pigs, for example—have been heavily publicized, while its triumphs in what Secretary Rusk calls the "back-alleys war" have necessarily gone unsung. Without the CIA's dogged and ingenious work the U.S. would know less and be in a far shakier position in the world today.

Its function as aid and comfort to assorted honest but indigent causes, on the other hand, is questionable in the extreme.

Considering the CIA's reputation, it is surprising that many of the organizations it has covertly supported tend to be liberal (even a project under Norman Thomas got funds). Some of the activities are so spectacularly worthwhile in themselves that almost the only way to discredit them would be by associating them with intelligence operations. It is reasonable to ask how this was permitted to happen.

Fifteen years ago the political climate in Washington was such that the easiest way to feed government funds into certain projects (such as sending student delegations abroad) was by subterfuge. Congress was in no mood to give the money openly. The CIA being in the subterfuge business, the Administration appointed it bagman. Subsequently, the CIA took advantage of its position in some cases to recruit agents and otherwise use the dependent groups.

Not everyone was so abused. But now that the whole thing is blown, everyone involved has been compromised.

Tyle 3/3/67

basis, bankroll the good works. other government agencies, on an open public officials, have found it necessary to nothing of four Presidents and a host of ficers of a large number of groups, to say serving a myth of independence, the of cannot afford it. All for the sake of pretheir "amateur" status even when they cal American unwillingness to see cerwith the agency but with the hypocritilong. However, the root blame is not the first place, and for doing it much too job that it shouldn't have been doing in Agency should stick to intelligence and let deviousness. The Central Intelligence tain types of individuals or activities lose countenance an extraordinary degree of The CIA may be faulted for doing a