

1/5/72

Dear Ned,

Although the return receipt on your registered package of 1/3 will indicate I received it, I add that the enclosed list seems to accord with the contents. I've not yet refilled the various items. I presume it is complete for as you know, I kept no list of what you had.

The package and contents were damaged. ^{is} This is not a claim against you and I can't make one to the post office for that would require surrendering that which was damaged, about 150 electrostatic pages. Rather it is a suggestion for the future, based on our considerable experience with the new portal science, the destructive capabilities of which exceed the imagination of the uninitiated. For a package with this kind of contents newspaper is an inadequate protection. Cardboard is preferable, and it is generally a wise precaution to have an inner wrapping under the cardboard when there are so many loose sheets. Also, the wrapping paper on the outside is too thin for such weight and contents.

What is missing and what I did ask for is your assurance that you had made no copies of any of what I loaned you for very limited purposes and that you would not make or permit any use to be made of any of this material. This was specifically understood and the one exception to the showing of any of this stuff was for something you planned that never came to fruition.

Sincerely,

Harold Weisberg
