A main doc, the Monolith, reported on the chart-ordered reader of secret information on the FBI's seven top-secret counterintelligence programs. The Bureau committee, once presented, was not spy operations, they were programs under which the FBI targeted groups, organizations and individuals for harassment and infiltration "to disrupt and otherwise neutralize" their activism.

A freedom of information suit got a court order forcing the FBI to release documents on the purpose, scope and nature of the counterintelligence program against the New Left. Because the document that terminated the COINTELPRO-New Left also terminated the other six programs, the Bureau was forced to make at least the names of all six public last month.

The seven Cointelpros were: Cointelpro- Espionage; Cointelpro- View Left; Cointelpro- Right wing of White into Groups; Cointelpro- Counterintelligence Program; Cointelpro- Black Extremists; and Socialist Workers Party- Disruption Program. The Bureau released two directives from late FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover, one which set up the program against the New Left in May of 1963 and the other which discontinued all six programs on April 28, 1971.

In a strange press relations move, the FBI delayed releasing the documents two months and then made them public on the same day Vice President Ford took his oath of office, judging correctly they would get scant attention with the flood of news dictations Ford

Two weeks ago, two more documents on the Cointel programs were quietly released in Washington under the same court order by the U.S. Attorney's office. There was no press release and the documents received virtually no media circulation, although they go further than any other internal FBI memoranda previously released, stolen or leaked in documenting the parochial, capricious, and vindictive approach the Hoover FBI took toward the protest movements of the late sixties.

then Assistant Director in charge of the Bureau's Domestic Intelligence Division, setting forth justifications for the two Hoover directives previously released. They conclude "In record" after the day before the respective Hoover orders, and offer an unusual opportunity to see the bureaucratic FBI mind lacking at social protest and the anti-war movement.

"Our Nation is undergoing an era of disruption and violence caused to a large extent by various individuals get locally connected with the Black Panthers," wrote Johnson. "Most of those activists are revolutionaries in American society, and they do not think they have a right to live." They carry weapons, usually allude people to death, and do not much like the law or individual acts to further their so-called causes.

"The Newell has on many occasions viciously and scurrilously attacked the Director and the Bureau in an attempt to hamper our investigation of it and drive us off college campuses.

"With this in mind, it is (the Domestic Intelligence Division's) recommendation that a new Counterintelligence Program be designed to neutralize the New Left and the Key Activists. The Key Activists are those individuals who are the moving forces behind the New Left and on whom we have intensified our investigation."

The next day, Hoover issued the order setting up Comint-Apro-New Left. The purpose of the program, Hoover wired his agents, "is to expose, and otherwise neutralize the activities of the various New Left organizations, their leadership and adherents."

New Left groups were to be followed on "a continuous basis," he ordered. Agents were to take advantage of all opportunities for disruption and disruption within the young leftist groups and keep information about party and their leaders very well linked to the news media both locally and nationally through "reliable news sources."

"We must frustrate every effort of these groups and no opportunity should be missed to capitalize upon the

the market was willing to allow to the country.

The Brennan policy remained largely the same when it was clear from the Hoover days he could not do New Left programs without the approval of a civilian agency, that the FBI had to do its own program, a little more "honest" than the original set of criminal acts. Brennan never told his agents to get into young people "too deeply," challenging the rightness of what he felt was the ~~revolution~~ ... he considered education.

A step from Brennan's domination of the New Left "key activists" that the Bureau was still tied up in the old "out-and-expel" perspective on social issues, came in his emphasis very soon after the memorandum of White House that he was such a collection of violent "straights" who carry a lot of hash around. The White House knew it could trust Hoover's view of the "criminal" to bring the FBI to bear those who challenged the government in organized radical protest. The FBS, never used to intervene internally from the offices on Stern for "key" "movement activities," although the Service refused to do so after the President's White paper "experts."

The White House ordered Hoover to terminate all other Cointel programs or to say for how long they had been in operation. Interviews with several former agents, however, date the counterintelligence program against "Black extremists" within a month of the New Left program, in April or May of 1970. The programs against espionage and the American Communist Party probably go back decades. The program against the white hate groups, primarily the American Nazi Party and the Ku Klux Klan, was apparently begun in the 1950s. And the Covert agents of the Revolutionary Workers Party, the largest Trotskyite socialist group in the US, was begun in 1961, according to papers the Justice Department filed in a New York court last week.

FBI Director Hoover cancelled all seven Cointel programs about a week after a group that called itself the Citizen's Commission to Investigate the FBI began circulating to insurance brokers of secret FBI memos and files stolen from the Media, Pa., office of the FBI in March of 1971. What was reported as an informed description last week — that Hoover cancelled the Cointelpros in his frantic and worried fury after the "Media Papers" began to circulate — is ironed out by the wording of the Brennan policy memo on the termination order.

"To afford additional security to our sensitive techniques and operations, it is recommended the Cointelpros operated by the Domestic Intelligence Division be discontinued," wrote Brennan. The emphasis on threatened "security" and the uncommonly defensive phrasing suggest that the Bureau wanted to be able to lean heavily upon this memo if the Media revelations spilled over into the Cointel programs. (Indeed, a notation on one of the Media papers that there was a FBI program called Cointelpro-New Left was the basis for Stern's original suit for access.)

The termination of the formal Cointel programs on April 23, 1971 probably did not mean the end of similar neutralize-and-destroy FBI operations. By withdrawing official approval, Hoover, the ultimate bureaucrat, covered his own ass; but to withdraw approval is something quite different from forbidding. And as I reported last month, academics who have done counterintelligence work for the Bureau, have told me that top level FBI officials acknowledged in the summer of 1971, that the Cointelpros were on, indeed, and intelligence units still trying to deepen the cultural war at the Cleaver and Newton funeral, and slant the Black Panther Party. (They were apparently successful, as they were with the New Left, the CP, etc.)

The Phoenix was able to interview former FBI agent Robert Wall, who now lives in Canada, just in the FBI for five years, and from late 1968 to 1970 was assigned to the Washington field office working on the left and black militiamen. In my last article, I described one Cointel project, which had written about elsewhere, in which he had a large letter sent to the National Mobilization Committee in 1969 demanding $10,000 "secretly paid" for the Mob's upcoming demonstration in the name of the D.C. Black United Front.

"They were constantly asking for suggestions on how we could screw the Black Panther Party," said Wall. "It's one kind of a special target, because had it's own aggressive counterintelligence program, beginning from somewhere in May of 1968 right through when I left in 1970."

In 1969, Stokely Carmichael was organizing in Washington and, in an effort to limit his mobility, Wall's crowd came up with a Cointelpro suggestion that someone should contact him with a false death threat, or information about a plot in his life. "It was approved but we didn't get it back to execute," said Wall. "I heard later that they had a Black clerk in the New York Police phone him with the warning."

A suit by the Socialist Workers Party charging the government with infringing on its members civil liberties, will probably be the next major source of information on the FBI's counterintelligence tactics.
