Dear Fred,

Encountering trouble with the thumb makes unavoidable use of that hand for extracting files from over-jammed cabinets, so I'll reply to your letter 2/17 from memory. I did understand you to say your call was to tell me that you would respond to the questions I wrote, and I took those things you did go into to be illustrative of the conduct you intended. Those may well have been helpful but I have an adequate record of them. However, as I think you realize, you did not address some that I think more the more important. Here I must not fail, for my own writing, but I take the liberty of suggesting for your thinking and in your interest. In particular those questions I asked about your satisfaction, at the time and in retrospect, about your own professional performance; did you treat this as all other stories, did you do as you would have with an ordinary story, things like that. My own view - have made clear to you in our conversations, I believe in advance of Lettieri's seeing anything. This is the kind of thing I feel I must address, and I would prefer not to address it without consent from you. Unless you were content, I'll have to be limited to my own recollection of the past and my observations of present practices.

Your second graph is a repetition of what you told me. I not only do not doubt it, but it comes perfectly good sense. That is no new development in newspapering. In the 30s my own editors kept ticklers, and I maintained my own. If I did not ask if you inquired into the basis for selecting Lettieri, as I think I did, if you did ask who are under no constraints, I'd like to know the answer. Frankly, it mystifies me, as does the decision to let anyone see this stuff now, at a time of least interest and no public demand at all, even after the other sensation you started. I know of no single second-day story -anywhere. Some paper papers did all but ignore it. I know of one that followed your piece with a call to Khadafi and between the two carries less than two sticks. So, with no popular or memory interest to serve, I also find myself wondering if the original idea was Marshall's. There is no reason to presume and I do not presume a pre-existing relationship between him and Lettieri, and my own hunch is that politically they are wide apart. As I think of this I regard it as more likely that someone he felt he could trust gave Marshall the idea, and if this is correct, the field is pretty limited. Marshall is so withdrawn and so hungup I doubt he really knows what he is into, and the last thing he'll do is talk to somebody who does or can know nor holds a view contrary to the official line. I doubt his self-respect if, indeed, his reputation, survives what he has done has not done. In what for me is a considerable cost in time, and sometimes in cooperation, I have tried to inform him, but he just refuses to think, depending, I would suppose, on those in his part in whom is total self-confidence. There are none so blind as those who will not see. Anyway, this is an area in which, if you have non-confidential knowledge, I would welcome it.

If you cannot or will not take the time to answer the unanswered questions in writing, I have this suggestion: I have a consultation with an orthopedic surgeon within walking distance of your office at 9:30 a.m. The consultation itself should not take long. I can not forecast whether x-rays will be indicated, or therapy, or scanning for a brace (I never knew they came for that), but any one of these things could detain us. If you are then free, I'll bring my tape recorder and we can go over the remaining questions. If not at the factory for repairs in time by then, I'll bring, both if you would like one for yourself. If you would and I have only the one machine, I'll make a site for you. This is to satisfy you, if you have any question, about fidelity of quotation, direct or indirect. Should you like, I am quite willing to further, as you have in part known all along. I'd welcome a visit from you here. At no hour from your office, less from northwest or suburban Maryland. There may be some things you'd like to know, depending on what, some while now to be in circulation.

Should you elect this, there may be some other side-benefits in it for you, if you have a family. I know only the once reference you make in Type, that my wife and I now between you and your wife in bed, when you both wanted to read it (accomplished not reflected in your subsequent brief comment on it). If you have kids, they might enjoy the country... if it is cold enough, we have a pond on which the neighborhood kids ice-skate.

I take another liberty and suggest you might want to think further of your sentence: "There may be some tricky business afoot here, but I'm not knowingly part of it, so I don't mind revealing anything." If I thought you were consciously part of any such thing, do you suppose I'd have made any of the offers I have made to you? But there is no doubt in my mind that both things are true, that there is "some tricky business afoot" and that you are part of it. I have more than once indicated to you that in my opinion you were used. You enjoy no monopoly, and I can show you how this happened from almost the first day with the CIA as a realization and is happening even today with that sort of thing. (If I forget to come back to this, remind me, for I can establish it with ease, and it says, in time, interest you.) If I am less than happy with some of your reporting, knowing the CIA policy and the problems of reporting so many things that one can't become expert in any, this does not lead to the deduction that you are dishonest or anything like that. I also know the degree to which a man covering a beat comes to depend upon and to trust some of his sources. The real trouble I have here is indicated above, which led to my questions about the professionalism of your handling of the story, for here is where I think you hurt yourself and were responsible for the wholesale selling of fiction as reality, and I know others working in the field held a harsher view than I. It will take time for you to reach your own independent judgement.

The tricky-business part also leads to apprehensions about the normality you plan, "If Burton or us like fact much longer there will be a story in that." It is only natural that you carry this further, for that is a reporter's obligation. My concern is with some of the consequences, and the probability that there are those who will know that it is predictable that you will soon be asking questions, as others, surprisingly, have not. I consider it not unlikely that there may be some who want this, now, in official positions. I do not think Marshall does, and, I can also think of a ready answer he can give you: "I have let one expert see it. He has reported what he saw, and his reporting got wide attention. No, this was not more than the sensational and undignified use the contract was designed to prevent." Would you regard this conceivable without guidance from me? Or, would your editors? Without my knowledge, I would not, and I think Marshall has no reason to. My apprehensions lie elsewhere. My concern is with the further prostituting of truth, in the very broadest sense. You might want to consider if the future records that you were one of the instruments used for such purposes, as you have been several times, I do not by the remotest indication suggest with your knowledge or desire, you will then be content.

As you know, I can't deal with this without dealing with you, as you have no way of knowing, I have to do it twice. Your explanations about the one you do not know more than satisfy me and justify an account I think you will not resent. So you can understand how open my intentions are, I will be happy to show you both treatments in rough draft and if you have any objections or suggestions, will be glad to consider them. My goal is not for you to seek truth and the writing of as complete and accurate a record as I can on what I have come to regard as one of the major turning points in history as well as a unique study in the functioning of government. Thus, for example, answers to questions I might not find necessary to use in this epilogue to a completed book may have a future value as part of an archive. I have hundreds and hundreds of hours of tape interviews I think will serve future interests but I say never use in my writing or have or will use only in part. One of the great difficulties to me has been the willingness of an very generally regarded by "critics" as "the other side" to trust me and in many cases to provide real help. This includes public officials, Clay Shaw's friends and lawyers, who regard my treatment of him as extremely fair and privately say directly opposite what they alleged in court (you may recall they never stipulated he was a witness in that proceeding), even the most extreme of the very far right. Aside from assuring,

Thus there is an added reason for desiring answers to those questions + also, because you are others that may occur to you. The form is immaterial to us.

Bettimer's answer to questions I asked him very interest you. He will send me a reprint of whatever he writes.

You are a plumbline that interests me, although it may be difficult reading. I have been writing this while running from bursts of digging out. We have had the worst storm in years, with winds, I'm sure, close to hurricane strength. We thought we were with the snow, not your letter, in hand. You say that Bettimer "received a letter from Marshall that the Archives didn't consider a final approval." This reminds me of one of my experiences, where Marshall twice told me that it was okay with him if it were okay with the archivist which, need I tell you, it was not. If something like this happened, it would have the net effect of letter snowdrifts, not Marshall, make the final decision. That is what happened with me.

I also have heard from Cyril recently. He then had had no approval. No word is no approval. He asked me if I would consult with him prior to his going in if he were approved. My response was that this would depend on conditions. Please they change, I do not approve his seeing this stuff now because of the conditions in context. On this I seem to be a minority of one. However, everything that has happened convinces me that my understanding and my position are correct.

Earlier I referred to the Ray case. If you have interest in the point I am making, get the current issue of Required and read what I do not believe you can be in a position to evaluate, Lynne Shan's piece, "Are You Sure You Know Who Killed Martin Luther King?" There are several easily comprehended points at which it becomes apparent that, according these to have been of interest, he was used, whether the diabolists be him or that of another or others, the consequences can be quite serious and evil. Ray's unsuccessful efforts to escape six days ago may be one. That he was not killed in that effort is a fortunate accident.

Best,
