The Reference System

The President John F. Kennedy Assassination Records Collection Reference System is an electronic index to the collection of assassination-related material in the National Archives. Agencies that hold assassination records are required to record information about these records on Record Identification Forms (RIF) for input into a master database. A copy of the RIF is also attached to each document.

Many documents in the database are still under review by certain agencies or have been postponed from disclosure. This information is noted in the RESTRICTIONS field or the CURRENT STATUS field of the RIF. Updates to the system are made as agencies complete their reviews and transfer newly opened records to NARA. The database was last updated on November 7, 1995, and currently contains 170,873 records.

Not all the material found in the collection is indexed in the database. Material that was open for research on October 26, 1992, the day the JFK Act was signed, and was in the custody of the National Archives, did not have to be entered into the database. Most notably, most of the materials gathered by the President's Commission on the Assassination of President Kennedy (commonly called the Warren Commission) have not been separately indexed.

NOTICE

USERS SHOULD BE AWARE, this database is a compilation of entries input by the originating agencies. Although the National Archives and Records Administration provided guidelines for data entry, the master database is inconsistent in the terms used to describe records. Please keep this in mind when planning your database searches.
