

Watergate Speech Decision

Why Nixon Was Vague

By William Bradford Huie

Washington Post Staff Writer

Washington, D.C.

When President Nixon sat down to make his speech on the Watergate scandal, he was in a room with a staff of advisers, including

Henry Kissinger, Alexander

Haig, and others. He was to make a speech to the nation, and he was to do it in a way that would be a turning point in the history of the country.

He was to do it in a way

that would be a turning point in the history of the country.

speech, Mr. Nixon sat down

with a staff of advisers

and they discussed the

speech for several hours.

At the end of the meeting,

Mr. Nixon said that he was going to make a

speech that would be a

turning point in the history of the country.

He was to do it in a way

that would be a turning

point in the history of the

country.

He was to do it in a way

that would be a turning

point in the history of the

country.

He was to do it in a way

speech, Mr. Nixon sat down

with a staff of advisers

and they discussed the

speech for several hours.

At the end of the meeting,

Mr. Nixon said that he

was going to make a

speech that would be a

turning point in the

history of the country.

He was to do it in a way

that would be a turning

point in the history of the

country.

He was to do it in a way

that would be a turning

point in the history of the

country.

He was to do it in a way

speech, Mr. Nixon sat down

with a staff of advisers

and they discussed the

speech for several hours.

At the end of the meeting,

Mr. Nixon said that he

was going to make a

speech that would be a

turning point in the

history of the country.

He was to do it in a way

that would be a turning

point in the history of the

country.

He was to do it in a way

that would be a turning

point in the history of the

country.

He was to do it in a way