

NyTimes
10/8/1973

By Anthony Lewis

On an income of more than $200,000, Richard M. Nixon paid $792.61 in Federal income tax for 1972. The year before he paid $5,763. Those figures, published in the Providence Journal-Bulletin, have not been that far from the truth. The amount of his income of $200,000 was actually more than $200,000.

The figures were obtained from the Internal Revenue Service by the Providence Journal-Bulletin. The newspaper's investigation revealed that the Nixon family's income for 1972 was $200,000, and for 1971 it was $200,000. The figures are based on the family's tax returns for those years. The Nixon family's income for 1972 was $200,000, and for 1971 it was $200,000. The figures are based on the family's tax returns for those years.

ABROAD AT HOME

1. Mr. Nixon did not sign the papers for the General Services Administration to release the documents. The documents were released by the official GSA employee who signed the signature of the Nixon family.

5. An appraiser named Robert Newman selected 392 cubic feet of documents out of the original 1,217. Newman "riffed" and put their value at $570,000. Mr. Newman said he could not do a detailed valuation in early 1985 and could have had no way of knowing the figure in April, 1985. The Archives learned precisely which papers were said to constitute the bulk of a letter from Mr. Nixon to the President in 1970.

The Nixon family and a 12-member panel in the Washington Post and the Boston organization for the American and Advocates of the American Revolution and even the National Archives and Records Administration. The Nixon family and the American and Advocates of the American Revolution and even the National Archives and Records Administration.

Mr. Nixon did not sign the papers for the General Services Administration to release the documents. The documents were released by the official GSA employee who signed the signature of the Nixon family.