Dear Clay,

This hasty note as I am about to leave for a medical appointment and can make today's mail by mailing it then.

I've begun to read the clean, retyped copy of the Brown manuscript, and my is that easier reading! For which I am grateful.

There are two errors that ought not be further duplicated in what you are working on now, simple errors but frequent.

There is no comma or period before citation of source, as in (page 100). I think you misunderstood my correcting and drawing a line from the periods I had before the parens and misunderstood that to mean I was inserting the comma when I was blacking out the period. In part at least this is because the copy of the rough draft I had and sent you was not the original, which was not returned by the man who offered to retype it.

Any punctuation, a period if the end of the sentence, is after (page 100).

When what is quoted and indented, single space, is a quotation of a book or document, the need for " is eliminated. The indentation and single-spacing take care of that. If what is quoted from a source is within quotes in what is quoted, those quotes and kept in.

You've made very few typos. Wish I could type that well!

Many thanks and best wishes,

Hardy
