Dear Emilio Poggi,

Apologies are a poor substitute for what we should have done. At best they convey our regrets.

Once I got to San Francisco, my pace was such I had little time to think. Not until I got home and looked inside my wallet did I remember I had promised to phone your home and report my schedule once I knew it. It was a pretty intensive one, and it and a few painful unexpected experiences, I fear, captured my mind and drove from it what should have remained there.

You were very kind, and there is no justifying my forgetting. I can only assure you it was not intentional.

There was not a single night I got as much as a half of a night's sleep. One night I didn't get in bed at all, the night after we met.

Aside from my appearances, I also continued my investigating, with some results.

Please forgive me.

I haven't yet had a chance to unscuff. There is a pile of things to be taken care of immediately and my wife sprained her ankle as soon as I got home, so I'm really preoccupied.

If there were any books I was to have sent, please let me know and I'll do that.

Again, my sincere regrets.

Yours,

Harold Weisberg
