ACLU Wins Supreme Court Ruling on Police Surveillance

The Supreme Court has ruled in favor of the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) in a landmark case concerning police surveillance. The ruling, which was announced on Monday, states that the government's use of wiretapping and other forms of electronic surveillance is unconstitutional unless it is based on a specific warrant issued by a judge. The ACLU had argued that the government's surveillance programs violated the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and seizures. The Court's decision is a significant victory for civil liberties advocates and is expected to have a major impact on the way law enforcement agencies conduct their operations.
