

Judge Lets Foreign Defendants Examine U.S. Evidence

A federal judge in New York has granted foreign defendants the right to examine U.S. evidence in their case. Judge Sherman ruled that the government's refusal to allow the defendants to see the evidence was a violation of their constitutional rights. The judge's decision is a landmark ruling in the history of international law. The defendants, who are accused of various crimes, have been held in custody since their arrest. The government has argued that the evidence is so sensitive that it should not be made available to the defendants. However, Judge Sherman found that the government's argument was not convincing. He ruled that the defendants have a right to know what evidence is being used against them. This ruling is expected to have a significant impact on the way that the government handles international cases.

Among the requests denied by Judge Sherman was one that the government should disclose the names of the informants who provided the evidence against the defendants. The government argued that this information was so sensitive that it should not be disclosed. However, Judge Sherman ruled that the government's argument was not convincing. He ruled that the defendants have a right to know the names of the informants who provided the evidence against them. This ruling is expected to have a significant impact on the way that the government handles international cases.
