

Philip Daniel Berrigan Rejected Offer to Leave From U.S. Prison

The Rev. Philip Daniel Berrigan, a prominent peace activist, has refused an offer to leave the Federal Reformatory for Women in Alderson, West Virginia, where he is serving a 30-month sentence for his role in the 1968 bombing of the U.S. Courthouse in St. Louis.

Berrigan, 42, was offered the opportunity to leave the prison in exchange for a 10-year term of house arrest. He has declined the offer, stating that he would rather remain in prison than live under the conditions of house arrest.

The offer was made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) as part of a plea bargain. Berrigan's attorney, however, has advised him to reject the offer. The attorney stated that the offer was "unfair" and that Berrigan would be "forced to live under the constant surveillance of the FBI."

Berrigan has been in prison since his arrest in St. Louis in 1968. He is a member of the Catholic Church and is known for his radical views on peace and social justice. He has been a vocal critic of the Vietnam War and has been involved in several acts of civil disobedience.

The offer to leave the prison is the first of its kind for Berrigan. He has previously been offered similar deals, but he has always refused them. He has stated that he is willing to serve his full term in prison and that he will not be intimidated by the government.

The offer has been widely reported in the news. Many people are surprised that Berrigan would refuse such a deal. Some believe that he is being stubborn, while others believe that he is being principled. Berrigan's decision has become a symbol of his commitment to his beliefs.

The FBI has stated that it is disappointed that Berrigan has rejected the offer. However, it has also stated that it will continue to monitor Berrigan's activities and that it will take appropriate action if necessary.

Berrigan's decision has also been seen as a challenge to the government's policy of offering plea bargains to political prisoners. It has raised questions about the fairness of such deals and about the rights of political prisoners.

Berrigan's attorney has stated that he will continue to represent Berrigan in court. He has also stated that he will continue to fight for Berrigan's release from prison. He has stated that he will not be deterred by the government's actions.

Berrigan's decision has also been seen as a statement of his faith in the American justice system. He has stated that he believes in the right to a fair trial and that he will not be intimidated by the government. He has stated that he will continue to fight for his rights and for the rights of others.

The offer to leave the prison is a significant development in Berrigan's case. It is a test of his resolve and of his commitment to his beliefs. Berrigan's decision to reject the offer is a clear statement of his faith in his principles and in the American justice system.
