of bribery. He was also jailed for violations of federal narcotics laws. Ruby eventually became the owner of two Dallas night clubs, both of which were hangouts for gamblers and dope racketeers.

Ruby Tied to Narcotics

In 1956, two undercover informants told the FBI that Ruby was involved in "a large narcotics setup operating between Mexico, Texas and the East." From other sources, the FBI heard that Ruby was the "fixer" who served as the liaison agent between the Dallas gambling mob, the city police and the county authorities.

Ruby had several pals in the Havana gambling mob, including Dave Yaras, a former Chicago hood; Norman Rothman, a high ranking member of the Cuban crime cartel headed by Meyer Lansky and Santo Trafficante of Florida; and Lewis McWillie, a former owner of a night club in Dallas. McWillie left Texas in the 1950s to become the supervisor of a mob-owned casino in Havana.

In late August 1959, Ruby flew to Havana for a "social visit" with McWillie. He spent eight days there and left for Miami after the Labor Day weekend. At the time, Trafficante was in a Cuban jail, where he was treated more as a guest than a prisoner, receiving meals from the best restaurants and visits from fellow mobsters and Castro.

Trafficante had been arrested June 8 in Havana for deportation to the United States, where federal officers were waiting to question him about Mafia murders and a Cuban-based narcotics ring. Actually, it was reported, because he was aware of the federal interest in his activities, Trafficante had asked the Cuban officials to arrest him and hold him in jail until the mainland heat died down.

Four days after the Kennedy assassination, a British journalist walked into the American Embassy in London and told CIA officials there that he met Trafficante while they were both in a Cuban jail in the summer of 1959. He said one of Trafficante's visitors had been "an American gangster type named Ruby." This information was passed on to the Warren Commission, but it was not mentioned in the commission's report. Nor did the report mention a mystery trip to Havana that Ruby made on Sept. 12, 1959. He left Miami on Pan Am Flight 415 and returned the next day on Pan Am Flight 750.

After Ruby had killed Oswald, FBI agents visited the racketeer Jones in jail and asked for his view of why Ruby had committed the slaying. Jones shrugged and replied, "Ask Joe Civello."

Civello, a convicted narcotics dealer, was the reakets boss of Dallas. A delegata to the 1957 crime convention at Apalachin, N.Y., he was an underboss of Carlos Marcello, the Mafia ruler of Louisiana and Texas. Marcello, a friend and rackets associate of Trafficante, hated the Kennedy brothers because of federal efforts to break up his empire. When President Kennedy died, those efforts stopped.
