Warren Beatty's gang-land love story "Bugsy" and Walt Disney's animated fairy tale "Beauty and the Beast" took top movie honors at Saturday's Golden Globe Awards.

Though "Beauty and the Beast" took three awards, there were no runaway winners at the Hollywood Foreign Press Association's 49th Golden Globes, held Saturday at the Beverly Hilton in Beverly Hills.

In awards that sometimes provide an indication of Oscar front-runners, dramatic acting awards went to Jodie Foster, Nick Nolte, while comedy prizes went to Bette Midler and Robin Williams. Oliver Stone took best director honors for his controversial interpretation of the assassination of President Kennedy in "JFK."

Best drama film honors went to Beatty's "Bugsy," the story of Las Vegas pioneer Benjamin "Bugsy" Siegel. The movie had been nominated for eight awards, but won only a single Golden Globe.

Beatty, who appeared nervous accepting the award, awkwardly thanked director Barry Levinson and the rest of the cast and crew.

"You have to forgive me. I don't come out of the house anymore," he said.

Backstage after the televised awards ceremony, Beatty said the film breaks some of the rules of Hollywood movie making.

"There's an old Hollywood axiom that a happy picture is not necessarily a good picture," he said. "This picture flies in the face of that axiom."

Beatty also disclosed that his newborn daughter is named Kathlyn Bening Beatty, after Beatty's mother.

by Alan Menken and Howard Ashman. Ashman died of AIDS before the film's release.

Ashman's sister, Sarah Gillespie, called the movie's songs part of her brother's legacy. "These songs are his children," she said.

Menken said the movie deserved serious consideration for an Academy Award in the spring.

Oliver Stone defended "JFK" after accepting his Golden Globe.

"The film is being attacked, I'm being attacked, a million words are being wasted on that," Stone said backstage.

Kevin Costner, a star in the movie, also came to Stone's defense.

"I can't think of anyone who would do what Oliver has done, which is not run and hide from his movie," he said.

Top dramatic honors went to Foster for her portrayal of an FBI trainee in "The Silence of the Lambs," and to Nolte in "Prince of Tides."

Midler spoke of her disappointment that "For the Boys" wasn't a box-office success as she accepted the award for best actress in a motion picture musical or comedy.

"I want to thank the Foreign Press Association for honoring a film when the American public dismissed it," she said.

Williams won for best actor in the same category for "The Fisher King."

"The Fisher King" also brought a supporting actress award for Mercedes Ruehl.

Veteran actor Jack Palance won a supporting actor award for his performance as a grizzled co-whand in "City Slickers."

CBS dominated the television categories with seven awards for its shows and stars, led by best dramatic series winner "Northern Exposure."
