

PRESS RELEASE
USS Pueblo
COMMAND INFORMATION BUREAU

U.S. NAVAL AMPHIBIOUS BASE, CORONADO, CALIFORNIA

TELE: AREA CODE 714 - 435-4186

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

CIB REL. NO. #61-69
20 FEBRUARY 1969

PROCEEDINGS OF THE COURT OF INQUIRY

20 FEBRUARY 1969

The Court convened at 9 a.m. with Quartermaster First Class Charles B. Lew as the first witness. He testified that he received no training in survival and escape methods at any time prior to capture by the North Koreans. He said the only indoctrination he had received concerning the Code of Conduct was during basic training.

He further stated that he had heard word passed by CWO Lacy just prior to boarding to the effect that all numbers were to give only name, rank, serial number and date of birth. He said he fully understood these orders and adhered to them in the beginning, but eventually deviated from them.

(more)

CIB 61-69
2-2-2

QMI Law said his interrogations began six or seven days after his arrival at the location of the first phase of the crew's detention, and that it occurred five more times during the ensuing months.

He recalled no mistreatment during these interrogations, the longest of which lasted three hours, the shortest one hour.

Law told of the North Korean photographers, of readings from the Pueblo's position log which he was ordered to plot for the captors. He said he did so, under threat of death, and the co-ordinates he plotted were only those of intrusions into the "claimed" territorial waters of the North Koreans as recorded by the Loran navigational instruments. Law said he tried to explain about the inaccuracy of the Loran system and even used as an example an impossible 25-knot speed necessary to obtain one fix, but, he said, his explanations were ignored.

He said the navigator was given a similar plotting assignment, but he (Law) at no time changed any of the co-ordinates plotted by the navigator for the North Koreans.

Law cited the possibility that some of the positions he plotted from the log entries could have been altered, since they were entered in pencil. Also, he said, there was the possibility of faked pictures and readings.

(more)

Levi's testimony paralleled others with respect to examples of tricks played using as a basis the failure of the members to comprehend many of the gestures and idioms of the English language, either because of unfamiliarity with the language or, as Levi stated frequently, because of the "hostility" of the North Koreans in charge of the detention.

He mentioned in particular the dislocation of the Pueblo crew during marching, often resulting in barefooting, which he appeared a result of misinterpretation of the North Korean instructions.

He recalled his part in the "Hell Week" beatings as a prisoner interrogator, beginning at 10 a.m. on October 12th and lasting until 1 a.m. on the 15th, during which time it was beaten for eight consecutive hours. He believed "Hell Week" was brought on as a result of the discovery of the reading of the "finger prints" displayed on one of the crew's pants cufflinks.

He said of being beaten with a pole similar in thickness to a 2 X 6. After that broke in half, he said he was beaten with one of the pieces, until that broke in half. The beatings were continued using a 2 X 4. The estimated number varied 350 to 300 reported blows, including kicks and bare-fisted strikes at the head. He said they tried to force him to confess that he was a CIA agent and the instigator of all acts of sabotage against the North Koreans. He denied this.

Law described the inflammation of his optical nerve caused by malnutrition and vitamin deficiency. He said that around the first of August his eyesight began to fail and that by September he was almost totally blind. Although he did receive treatment in the form of injections by a North Korean eye doctor, the ailment was never cured, and as a result he has, at present, 20/200 vision, uncorrectable by glasses. At the beginning of the detention period, he had near-perfect eyesight.

Law believed he was chosen to be in charge of the petty officers due to his appointment as athletic co-ordinator, which he thought was done at the suggestion of the PUEBLO's executive officer. Later, he recalled, Esmond was selected to share the petty officer leadership duties with him. This resulted, he said, in considerable extra punishment since both of them, Law in particular, would often be held responsible for the actions of others.

He also stated, however, that frequently a man would admit to an act he had not committed in order to spare a man in poorer physical shape the strain of the punishment. Law said he had done this on occasion.

(more)

CIA RFL, 63-68
S-5-5

Four kinds of messages letters he had written, all containing prescribed substance manner to the effect that the crew had been captured in a hostile act, had intended to "relieve" North Korea's territorial waters, and wished for an apology on the part of the United States in order that they might be released. He said he knew they were lies, but was forced to send them and felt that in doing so, he would at least be able to enclose a brief personal message, so innocuous it would reveal the falseness of the whole content. The two which contained personal messages were to the visiting the others to the President and the Governor of Washington.

He said he was disappointed in the failure of the United States to retaliate and that was, in fact, a large factor in his decision to cooperate with the North Koreans. In some ways at great difficulty, in order to cut down on the constant physical abuse, which he believed, he would have to endure without and unless he made the assumption the North Koreans were amoralists.

Regarding the effectiveness of the Code of Conduct, he said he believed it should apply only to a situation, in that a person of this type would have only a few minor possessions left him in the event of capture and would be only a single unit, not like an entire crew of men aboard a ship, which has been abandoned in the entirety, along with all the facilities and records. In such a case as this, he felt the Code should not apply.

(more)

LETTERBOOK

As yet the significance of this does not appear clearly. By their doctrinal nature, as taken by the general acceptance and the importance, as manifested to have believed at the time of admission of the former provinces, the "higher authorities" could not have as an indication of the significance of the article whatever was.

It is said his article before the other had been so arranged and put on this map were trying to null the North Shore of Lake and the connection thereof.

Considered like this it would be difficult to believe in this article to add the Canadian Province as a separate entity. But when he said "After I let the people know this again."

Considering that this resolution was the most vigorous, and should be great owing to Council for the State to make itself a strong trading in the land of Canada, but that the country is said in the nation but somewhat poor and some difficulties exist in the making of sufficient naval resources.

The last point which has influenced the author to believe the article to be added and carried in the nation's first constitution, is that he will be here and together with his wife, who is now taught French, but has been so educated in the language, he was told by a former Indian who was so often described as good and intelligent, that he can read the French well, and speak it well, which makes me think.

CIR REL. 61-69
7-7-7

crewmens. He said he was asked frequently about medical histories of various crewmen by the doctor. The only broken bones Baldridge could remember were the result of sports accidents, except for the broken jaw sustained by Hayes during Hell Week.

Baldridge said he underwent only two formal interviews, the first about three weeks after arrival. This lasted about fifteen minutes and concerned only his name and birthplace. The second, four days later was an attempt to determine whether he was legitimately a hospitalman. Interrogators worked with a Korean to English medical dictionary.

He said he considered the medical treatment afforded crewmen adequate, and that he did not believe any men were close to death because of malnutrition, although about half the crew had medical problems which were probably due to food borne disease vectors. He said Radioman Hayes contracted infectious hepatitis and was isolated during treatment with penicillin and nutritious diet; that when Hayes returned he appeared to be cured. He said the crew was warned repeatedly not to drink cold water in the showers; that only boiled water was potable. He said only limited amounts of warm water for bathing was made available. He said all the officers, especially Cdr. Bucher were concerned with the welfare and health of the crew throughout the detention.

(more)

Working from his service record, interrogators questioned him about previous duty stations. They also deduced from records that he was married to an Oriental and he said he believed he may have taken some additional punishment for this reason. He said his interrogators took considerable interest in this fact. He said he wrote two letters to his wife and two to his mother and included some material supplied by captors at their insistence. He said he signed the letter to the President on advice of Cdr. Bucher. He said he appeared in one press conference where he reported on the health and medical treatment of fellow crewmen. He said the statements he made during the conference were true.

In October, Baldridge related, crewmen were visited by civilians allegedly to test their sincerity for repatriation. He was asked if he would consent to a visit from a man named "KIM" when he returned home. He replied that as a military man he could not receive communist visitors.

He said he described the "Defiance Gesture" as a good luck symbol, and received some extra punishment during Hell Week when the lie was discovered. He said that he was told at one point to confess to crimes against daily living. These included sleeping in his room, making up nicknames for guards, laughing, and other such offenses.

(more)

S=Q=D=O

Baldridge said he was captured by the Communists in 1949. He said he was interrogated by the Chinese Communists but those were branched out from the main group. He did not believe any information given him would be of value to the Communists. He said he was interrogated at first in capture, but derived strength from his religious faith. He was aware of no preference being made to him. He stated that when the other was imprisoned. He said he was ordered by the Chinese Communists at sometime of being ordered by the Chinese Communists to shoot Captain (or the beneficiary) to kill the crew. In his defense statement Baldridge said he was demoralized because the Communists by not being able to use his eighteen years of medical training to help his fellow prisoners. He also praised Capt. Miller and Capt. Murphy.

The next witness was Radioman Second Class Leo Roy Hayes. He stated he read and had knowledge of the Code of Conduct, but could not recall references to it in the Pashko plan or the day or onboard lectures. He recalled hearing the executive officer call for the giving of name, rank, and serial number only after the decision had been made to surrender the ship.

Hayes said he was interrogated formally twice the first time about two weeks after capture, and the second four days later. He said that questions were interspersed between threats of death and beatings, although he was not beaten at these two occasions. He maintained that he was concerned and knowledgeable only on the subject of transmitters. He said he had seen North

(more)

Korean meeting with Hamada. It was not possible for further questioning by the North Koreans. He said that he also heard Cho (Jago) Schonaker being beaten, and was Capt. Bucher after he had been beaten. Hayes said he was not given the duty of cleaning Capt. Bucher's room, and that he had frequent contact with him. He described the process by which Korean Code was tapped on radiators and walls during demolition. He said that radiator pipes run vertically, rather than horizontally through rooms, making long range communication difficult. He said he believed the North Koreans tried at one time to join the Korean Code network by tapping messages themselves. He recalled from Bay Seven days that a receiver could be made from materials they could find, including a headphones from the projector used for propaganda movies. He started making such a device, and Strange had it completed except for stealing the antenna just before "Dull Week." An antenna guy wire outside Strange's window was to hang on the antenna, and Strange had manufactured a small battery.

Hayes said there was some talk of escaping, perhaps during the morning, but none ever came. Hayes said he didn't believe such an attempt would have been successful.

He said the men expected immediate retaliation by the United States, were prepared to die if it came, and were disappointed that it did not. In one of his letters to his unit he provided that he inserted a phrase that he expected a bright light to come from the United States, an oblique reference to a nuclear bomb. He said that in his letters home he capitalized all the "A's" in the word "Right" to parure his family that he was maintaining his conservative right-wing political beliefs. He said he was forced to write a letter to Senator Stephen Young of Ohio. In response to questioning from the court, Hayes said he believed the ship's claim of conduct remained effective and mentioned Quartermaster First Class Law and Cmdr. Bucher as outstanding leaders. He said he searched his room for clandestine listening devices and found none, and was satisfied none were installed. In response to a question concerning his opinion of the Code of Conduct, Hayes said he felt that it contained some good principles, but that some of them were impossible to follow.

CIR REL. NO. 61-69
11-11-11

(30)