bear dalter,

Not to long ago you asked me how I can live with so many futilities, so in the prelude to remindin; you of one Igive you a different kind of an wer.

In six days I will be 59. Yesterday I planted eight fruit trees and transplanted t o pines. Ly knees, today, sug cut that 59 is an old r age than 1 had thought.

Aight before last, before going to bed, we switched to the Washington educational TV station, on which we get a poor picture out good sound. They were broadcasting a program on the Gary convention. At one point someone I could not make out called out, "What about Rap Brown?"

Good question, but not a new one for me, as you may recall. Wran I sug ested a book, short and explosive, tontatively and perhaps poorly titled "The map map", there was no interest. When I sug ested there was more than a book in this, if you saw, you alone saw.

It is a good question, what about him. The situation is now changed. The prospects for the book should be better. And because it would be keyed to a lawsuit that should attract attention, the prospects of collateral good should also be good.

I also wrote Rap's agent, but got no interest. I can't write his lawyer, who is too busy being his own celebrating and doing his own good things for personal reasons involving his a ngup with bark ane. So, I do nothing about it. And the man thereby is jeopardized and what everyone forgets, two murders are not only unsolved but pinned on the victims.

All of this makes me wonder whether it is really 1 who live the futilities. True, I live under adverse conditions, with depressions and problems so multitudinous there is no day on which 1 haven t an abundant choice should I chose to worry. True, I write what can t be printed to find that long thereafter in some instances what 4 have written and almost forgetth suddnly comes interesting to others, like the dampton-Clark case, the essence of which, as of today, I worte when it happened.

But the real futility is not mine. There are other more apt designations, and they can and should include anguish.

But the futility, the real frustration, is test of others with fewer than 50 years. The tregedy is that in so many cases where what is so boldly talked about and not done could be done.

Recently, when I have had time to think, I have come to believe that the real frustration and the genuine futility is for those for whom detached rhotoric has become a thing untok itself, anx end, not a means. So, ends are not reached.

should any you know, perhaps such people as haley, be interested in seeking an answer to the "that about Kap Brown" question other than a some point Aunstler; will to the best of his needlessly-limited ability, present in some court, 1 will not find it a futility to try and help and I will be more more frustrated that I am now if nothing comes of it.

I have always folt that the best chances for the seak in combat is not to defend but to attack. Defense is so cally overwhelmed when it is weak.

Best regards,
