PARIS, July 9—The French secret police were accused yesterday of tapping a telephone at the satirical weekly "Le Canard Enchaîné" and passing the information they obtained to the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency.

The Canard was to publish Thursday a photostatic copy of a cable allegedly sent by CIA officers in Paris to Washington in October giving details of a telephone conversation between a Washington journalist and the paper's political editors, Claude Angelet, in Paris.

The cable allegedly gave the CIA's Washington office advance notice of a Canard article that named the new CIA representative in Paris, Eugene F. Burgstaller.

Nina Sutton, who made the call from Washington to the Canard, said: "There's no question that the information could only have been transmitted to the CIA after the Canard's telephone had been tapped. . . . The CIA cable contained information I passed on from Washington which was not published in the article."

Journalists at the Canard claim Washington was informed before the article was even written.

The accusation is sure to embarrass the French government, still squirming from a bungled attempt by France's internal secret service to install microphones in the Canard office 18 months ago. It was partly because of that scandal that President Valéry Giscard d'Estaing ordered an end to such activity.
