In the Name of National Security (Again)

President Ford sit as editor-censor for its report on the abuses of the CIA and other Representatives has agreed to let Here we go again. In the name of national security, the House of intelligence a gencies.

subordinates or his predecessors in office, whatever deletions would be necessary to thanks to the 246-to-124 House vote against immediate public release of the Pike avoid embarrassment for him, his Committee report. Mr. Ford apparently will be free to make the administration—evidence of clear-cut law violations, for instance, or of just plain stupidity, incompetency and hamor won't be made public is to reduce the handedness. But were it not for the No doubt the report contains a number of things (some of them already leaked) that could create profound embarrassment for entire exercise to a charade. leave it to the President to decide what will investigations in the first place, and to there would have been little point to the possibility of just such embarrassments,

Watergate, we boasted that we had learned the dangers of the so-called "imperial presidency" without effective For a self-righteous moment after > check or balance. The impeachment clear that it would be a long time before proceedings, we told ourselves, made the Congress again salivated to the bell of our representatives in Congress are persuaded that we wanted them to do what we go again. And probably an important reason for this quick fall from grace is that they have done. Well, it wasn't so long after all, for here country's ability to defend itself. Maybe it ability of this and future administrations would. Or maybe it would only weaken the other secret agencies would weaken the too much tampering with the CIA and the never take to the people for approval. to undertake secret policies it would The public seems to have concluded that better than ever now that we will come out rational limits on them. The chances are ween tampering with agencies and setting addressing that distinction. of this whole inquiry without ever really In any case, there is a distinction bet-most of us would probably accept as a basic distinctions between spying (which we won't even get around to addressing the There's a better-than-even chance that > representatives, let alone debated. produce not information policy results that political and military actions calculated to have not even been mentioned to us or our legitimate necessity) and surreptitious anybody's definition. The latter is a sort of real-life "Mission Impossible," except of us have no idea when our so-called inone to the other. telligence agencies crossed the line from that it always comes out right on TV. Most The former is "intelligence" by enemies may be up to, even if the effort necessitates, such unlawful acts as surreptitious means, what our potential of our government to find out, through burglary, theft, bribery of interception of private communications. Most Americans would support the duty agents provocateurs, the difference between joining groups and entrapping them. out what is happening or likely to happen and covert efforts designed to make something happen. It is the difference between FBI infiltration of domestic some of us) and the use of infiltrators as political groups to learn of their plans (however distasteful even that may be to But there is a difference between finding > particular polltical result in Italy. make intelligent policy decisions. It is situation in order to help our government -and secret American money—to force a another thing to use American agentsas possible about, say, the Italian political It is one thing to try to find out as much assassination or civil war. another to create, in "Mission Impossible" government friendly to our interests. It is pressures to keep in power a foreign fashion, a situation that could lead to It is one thing to use diplomatic support to one or another faction. can about the plans of a particular faction based on that intelligence, to lend military of the Angolan freedom fighters or even, It is one thing to find out as much as we sideration, not carried out secretly in the name of "intelligence." policy debate with congressional con-But that support ought to be the result of force us to call it by its right name. ought to pass the appropriate laws, after President to wage secret war against those If we are going to empower the he privately deems to be our enemies, we full debate. At the very least that would

And that name isn't "intelligence."