and said, "Con-gratulations," to Representative Lucien N. Nedzi. "Oh, I'm not so sure," replied

Mr. Nedzi, as a gentle shake of his baldish head displaced wisps of white sideburns. "I know the feeling," Mr.

Rodino concurred.

The encounter, a few paces off the House floor yester-day, symbolized the burden thrust on Lucien Norbert Nedzi, a 49-year old Demo-crat from Michigan, House leaders named him chairman of the new Select Committee on Intelligence. Together with on Intelligence. Together with a companion panel in the Senate, the committee is supposed to produce a de-finitive report within a year on the purposes and perform-ance of the nation's secret intelligence apparatus.

Sensitive Inquiry

Just as Mr. Rodino, a New Jersey Democrat, emerged from relative obscurity last year to direct the sensitive impeachment inquiry with a mixture of pride and trepida-tion, so is Mr. Nedzi now approaching the sensitive intel-ligence inquiry with alternat-ing bursts of confidence and aw

The Central Intelligence Agency and the Federal Bu-reau of Investigation, two of more than a dozen surveil-lance agencies under examination, have been accused of improprieties here and abroad, William E. Colby, the Director of Central Intel-ligence, watned Congress yesterday, however, that yesterday, however, that public pursuit of "exaggerat-ed" allegations was endangering an intelligence effort crucial to national security.

crucial to national security. "Finding out what hap-pened is the easy part of it," Mr. Nedzi said in an inter-view. "Indeed, most impor-tant elements of what the public is concerned about"— whether American citizens are subject to spying by their own Government—"already are in the public domain."

'The Big Problem' What most concerned Mr.

His sense of concern wakens him at night (Representative Nedzi, right, confering with Frank Church, head of Senate committee on intelligence.)

Nedzi, he suggested, was une conundrum at the heart of the House inquiry: "The big problem is determining the appropriate role of secret institutions in a free, democrat-ic society. We're being called upon to resolve that issue."

Lucien Nedzi was born on May 28, 1925, the son of Polish timigrants in Ham-tramck, Mich. His father was a bool and die maker. Mr. Nedzi enlisted in the Army in 1944, after completing public high school, and served in the Philippines and Japan. He received degrees in econom-ics in 1948 and in law in 1951 from the University of Michigan. He married the former Margaret Garvey in 1952. They have five children whose ages range from 8 to 16.

The closest he came to the intelligence sphere, prior to his election to the House in 1961, was when he was re-called to Army duty during the Korean War and given a short course in military intel-ligence at Fort Riley, Kan. Mr. Nedzi was released from active duty before the train-ing could be applied.

Liberal Reputation

As a member of Congress from Michigan's 14th District, which consists of some de-clining neighborhoods in Decliming heighborhoods in De-troit and such wealthy sub-urbs as Grosse Pointe Shores, he established a reputation as the most liberal member of the mostly conservative House Armed Services Com-mittae mittee.

Mr. Nedzi was an early opponent of the Vietnam war. He also opposed the develop-ment of the B-1 bomber and ment of the B-1 Donnoer and the antiballistic missile sys-tem. He was the last of the white liberal Democrats in the Michigan delegation to succumb to intense constituent pressure to publicly op-pose busing as a device to integrate public schools.

In late 1971, to the sur-prise of his colleagues, Mr. Nedzi was chosen as chair-man of the Military Intelligence Subcommittee. Repre-sentative F. Edward Hébert, the Louisiana Democrat who was as hawkish as Mr. Nedzi was dovish, said the Michi-gan Democrat was appointed "because he's a good man, even though we're opposed philosophically."

Some of the more ardent Congressional critics of the intelligence community have suggested privately that Mr Nedzi has not been vigilan enough in monitoring the C.I.A. and is overly incline to accept the agency view of questionable events.

set out two years ago to con-duct a broad review of the intelligence agencies but got sidetracked by a search, ap-parently fruitless, for possi-ble links between the C.I.A. and the Watergate scandals. That experience, Mr. Nedzi said, "certainly indicated the possible abuses that intelli-gence agencies can be in-volved in, either by direction of the executive branch or on their own." Nonetheless, he said he had found senior intelligence of-ficials, with "minor" excep-tions, "to be totally candid in responding to questions put to them" at closed hear-ings. The difficulty, Mr. Nedzi said, was that "it has taken some time to learn to ask the right questions." "To this day," he added, "T can't be certain we have

Such uncertainty seems to Such uncertainty seems to gnaw at Mr. Nedzi. He tries to relax at home by playing the violin and by "puttering around the house" with a paint brush or wrench. Five growing children, as he puts it, sometimes necessitate "gluing the furniture togeth-er."

He has a puckish sense of humor, a gentle mien and a soft, nasal voice that belie the wrenching sense of con-cern that has been causing Mr. Nedzi to awaken at night and try to lose himself in such diversion as a college textbook on medieval history.

Perhaps there were more Byzantine ages than one. Mr. Medzi keeps recalling a line from Lynon Johnson: "Doing what is right isn't the problem; it's knowing what is right."
