Nr. A.C. Spectorsky, Editorial Director, Playboy 919 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60611

Dear Mr. Spectorsky,

Thanks you for the courtesy of the teareheats of the Capote interview and the offer of consideration of a latter. Because I have just returned from an intensive trip, with copious notes untyped, to a wife with a temporary incapacity, please excuse the rough draft and por typing.

Should you find my thoughts of interest, please edit them any way you consider necessary. I presume you may want to shorten what I will regard as a too-brief demunciation and perhaps will want to moderate it. You need not return any changes to me for sporoval. I am helping EricNorden with his Minuteman piece. He expects to be here in four days. I will show him the carbon.

Of the unended, meedless troums following the great tragedy of the Ken edy assassination, one caused all the rest. That is the abdication of the intellectuals to whom our society normally turns for leadership and direction. Not a single established writer penned a single, serious questioning word. Trumen Capote had his "Cold Blood" and hot millions. Dwight Macdonald had his own kind of literary mesturbation. He also held tightly to an unfulfilled and uncancelled contract, thus denying this chance to be published to those who assumed the responsibility he abandoned.

So it remained to those of us previously unknown to redeem the honor of our craft in our quest for that of our country. To faced no adversery more resolute then the established literati, none more unified or ignorant, and certainly none more determined to alchamize its ignorance into reality. More than 100 publishers rejected my first book, also the first on the subject and the one that opened it, b fore it become ite own kind of privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-privately-pr opened it, before it became its own kind of privately-published best-seller and was reprinted by a house that had thrice declined it, twice without reading.

Literary cowards then silent now become heros, sudgling for the establishment press that makes them wealthy, their frivolities important; spologizing for the richer pimps for whom they whore. Witness Capote:

"I've read three or four of the most prominent books critical of the Sarron "eport, and I've also read the Serren Report...I believe the Report is correct in all its essentials..."

Capote thus becomes unique, the only man to read the Report and still believe it.

For him knowledge comes easily: hesimply invents it to serve his predetermined purposes. One flick of the forked tongue and instant evidence. Then a President is gunned down on the streets of an American city, in broad deylight, and then consigned to history with the dubious epitaph of a questionable official inquiry by the government that came into power by that murder, to Capote and his sick and craven ilk those who established the inadequacy of that inquiry are "vultures" and "nit-pickers":

"But I do understand very well all this nit-picking and speculation that's going on, because most of it is monetary; a bunch of vultures has discovered that pecking at the carries of a dead President is an easy way to make a living."

This from the man who sells his own superficial acrivenings by blamant homosexual self-display on the cover of his book and then bosats that it "improved my love (1) life(1); a wide variety of attractive (1) people(1) became highly available." (Egh!)

I leave it to Capote to make his living, if that is what it is, his own way. But for the record, I think Plevboy should note that with one exception, all whe profit is on the other side, that it is sycophency that pays. One never hears Congressman Ford, one of the architects of the needless tragedy of the fake (ghosted) investigation, termed a "vulture", even though his/books was the first. Legal eminence Louis Nizor, who wrote a glowing endorsement of the Terren Report when 100% of the alleged backstopping was unavailable and sold it in a commercial version of the official document is not a scavenger. If of the staff of the martyred President, from the namey of his children to his fat-mouthed flack are hardly vultures, although their fame and wealth comes from his murder. Least of all wrong to the omniscient writer Capote is the new dedication to the fraadom of writers in Pierre Selinger's introduction to the professional apology by asskissing White House Correspondent Charles Hoberts. ("The Truth About The Kennedy Assassing white House Correspondent is like "love" to a whore.) Hare Unplucky Pierre domanded that writers not in accord with the official flotion not be heard.

Manchaster, made a millionaire by his own peculiar fiction and the special scandal he paraenally manufactured, "alone and unsecisted", is hardly a "vulture packing on the carrien of a dead President".

Only those of whom Capote certainly is not one, those who seek discovery of the murderers and recepture of the integrity of our society, only we are "vultures".

Typically, Gapote boasts friendship with Brother Robert Kennedy. It he can lift his mind from the literary pig-trough long enough to try and understand the reality of the world he makes so obscene, and if he has but a slight portion off the window and understanding he pretends, he might, special thing that he is, enjoy the new essessination, the political one, being committed before his eyes. It is that of the "belowed brother", right now being framed with responsibility for the louey investigation over which he exercised no responsibility by those who did.

Those who have Capots for 3 friend need no enemies.

I am proud he declares himself mine.

Sincerely,

Harold Weisberg
