

the emotional feeling came within me that someone owed this debt to our beloved President to save her the ordeal of coming back," Ruby said. "I don't know why that came through my mind."<sup>59</sup>

As for the possibility that Ruby and Oswald knew each other, the Commission categorically ruled it out.

... [T]here have been numerous specific allegations that Oswald was seen in the company of Ruby prior to November 22, often at Ruby's Carousel Club. All such allegations have been investigated, but the Commission has found none which merits credence.

In all but a few instances where the Commission was able to trace the claim to its source, the person responsible for the report either denied making it or admitted that he had no basis for the original allegation. Frequently those responsible for the allegations have proved to be persons of erratic memory or dubious mental stability.<sup>60</sup>

The Commission also gave little credence to suggestions that Ruby might have had ties to organized crime. A short section in the Warren Report was dedicated to the subject. In it, the Commission stated that any links Ruby may have had with the mob were undoubtedly limited to the professional gamblers who frequented his clubs. Law enforcement agencies, the Commission wrote, had thoroughly investigated the matter and were satisfied that Ruby was in no way affiliated with La Casa Nostra families then operating in the United States.

As he finished reading the Warren Report, Howard Donahue was no more inclined to believe the Commission's critics than before. The Commission's exhaustive account of the events and people in Dallas seemed more than sufficient in his mind to resolve any doubts that may have existed.

Still, fairness required that he examine both sides of the story. He knew that for his True article to be credible, he would have to deal with the arguments made by those who did not believe the government's explanation of the killing.

And so, buying a little more time from his editor, Donahue found every book he could on the assassination and started to read.

3

THE CRITICS

FOR ALL OF DONAHUE'S CONFIDENCE IN THE Warren Report, he and others like him were fast becoming a minority by the mid-1960s. A survey conducted by The Washington Post in October 1966 found that 60 percent of the American people rejected the "main arguments" of the Warren Commission's findings and had "deep and abiding doubts about the official explanation" of the assassination.<sup>1</sup> This skepticism was driven by, and in turn, driving, a tremendous amount of written material about Kennedy's death. By the time Donahue began his research, dozens of articles and close to twenty books had been written on the murder.<sup>2</sup> Most were sharply critical of the Warren Report.

In tone and content, the books ranged from the sensationalistic to the scholarly, while their titles often reflected competing conspiracy theories that seemed to mushroom monthly in the dark, uncertain aftermath of the shooting: Oswald: Assassin or Fall Guy?, The Warren Report, Whitewash I—The Report on the Warren Report, Whitewash II—The FBI—Secret Service Cover-Up, Rush to Judgment, The Bastard Bullet. Not a bullet

Alleged conspirators ranged from disgruntled Cubans to the Russians to the Central Intelligence Agency, organized crime, right-wing fanatics, or any combination of the above. Writers sustained these theories with what they claimed were a host of unanswered questions, bizarre coincidences and outright contradictions in the Warren Commission's findings. The red flags emerged after reporters and writers began scrutinizing the Commission's twenty-six volumes of transcripts and evidence and after they started talking to witnesses the Commission chose not to hear.

One of the areas of greatest doubt centered on what quickly and derisively became known as the Commission's "magic bullet" theory: the claim that both Connally and Kennedy were wounded by the same bullet, probably the first Oswald fired. According to the critics,

214
MORTAL ERROR
not a Weisberg
all papers
finaly came up, Weisberg dismissed it out of hand. But despite his earlier claim, he could provide no photographs that refuted the thesis that the first shot was fired, no crack was visible on the limousine windshield. Ergo, Weisberg said, Donahue's belief that the first shot had missed, ricocheted, and struck the windshield with a fragment was unsupported by the photographic record.

Donahue responded by noting that the bright sunlight that day may have made the crack invisible from the front. As well, a bystander wearing white was visible through the windshield at exactly the place where the crack was later found. This likely further masked the presence of the broken glass in the Allgens photo.
Weisberg nonetheless remained adamant in his belief that the head bullet came from the front, from the grassy knoll. At one point he leaned forward conspiratorially and told Howard, "I have proof of the bullet entered from the front. The wound was surrounded by fragments." Donahue smiled wanly to himself. Weisberg's understanding of the fragments was exactly backward. An M-16 bullet—or any thin-jacketed, high-velocity round—enters the skull, disintegrates, and then deposits fragments on the side opposite from where it enters.

This was clearly demonstrated by the gelatin block tests the House Select Committee had conducted in 1977-78. Photos showed the M-16 round fired by committee marksmen shattered and tumbled after striking the gelatin and caused enormous "tissue" damage before spraying multiple, minute fragments forward, to the front of the block, opposite from the side the bullet entered on. (See illustration 26.)

In fact, the shattering, fragmenting "wound" in the gelatin nearly replicated exactly the one Kennedy suffered, although this was never acknowledged by the committee. Moreover, Donahue knew the only weapon capable of inflicting a frontal wound as massive as Kennedy's would have been a shotgun fired from a few feet away. No shotgun pellets were found in Kennedy's brain and, obviously, no one was seen with a shotgun along Elm Street.

Of course, the gunsmith mentioned none of these troublesome technicalities to Weisberg as the old man held court that afternoon. Donahue did point out that in his opinion, the bullet's trajectory, explosive disintegration and the size of the entrance wound proved Hickey had fired the last shot. He did not, however, belabor the point. It was obvious Weisberg knew absolutely nothing about firearms and ballistics. And it was equally obvious the critic had no desire to begin learning now.

Handwritten notes at the top of the page, including "MORTAL ERROR" and "not a Weisberg".

1 was never the only "with Weisberg" man who "shamefully died".
I hope Dies Hard
215

And so the day faded and Howard and Katie bid the venerable critic good-bye. More than anything else, the Donahues felt sorry for Weisberg as they drove home that evening. Here was a man over seventy years old who'd given a good part of his life to studying the Kennedy assassination. Now his health was failing, the state university couldn't care less about his painstakingly amassed collection of assassination documents and, to top it off, his conclusions about how Kennedy died were flat wrong. How they were the whole way to go

Following the encounter with Weisberg, Howard realized he would have to finish the investigation on his own. He knew there was an important subject that needed to be reexamined in greater detail: the Secret Service in general and, in particular, their actions in Dallas. What more could he learn?

Like many twentieth-century American institutions, the Secret Service was forged in the cauldron of the Civil War. Originally, the Service was conceived as part of the Treasury Department and charged with investigating and combating currency counterfeiting, which was endemic in the war years. It was not until after the assassination of President William McKinley in 1901 that the agency picked up the additional duty of protecting the President.<sup>2</sup>

In time the Service would also be responsible for shielding the vice president, the President-elect, major presidential candidates, former presidents and their wives, widows of former presidents, presidential children and visiting heads of state.<sup>3</sup> The agency also developed a sophisticated research division that today undertakes the daunting task of identifying and monitoring potential assassins. As well, the Service continues to retain authority in cases involving counterfeiting.

But it remains the President's stoic, steadfast bodyguards who dominate the public's perception of the famous organization. The Secret Service agent has emerged as something of an archetypal American hero in recent decades: strong, courageous, and willing to lay down his or her life in the blink of an eye to defend the leader of a free and open society. This image is not exaggerated, for the job is dangerous, difficult and relentlessly stressful. Even in earlier, less violent times, the lot of an agent was a hard one.

Kentuckian Edmund Starling worked on the White House protection detail for thirty years, from 1914 to 1944. His biography, written by Thomas Sugrue in 1946, provides one of the most detailed glimpses of the day-to-day life of an agent. The book captures the atmosphere of grinding pressure agents face as they wrestle with the nearly incompatible goals of protecting the President and allowing the American people a degree of access to their leader.

In one of his many letters home, Starling recounts a typically enervating journey—accompanying President Wilson to Philadelphia for the second game of the World Series in 1915:

Dear Sirs,
 I just got home from a pilgrimage to the New Jerusalem. Before my departure I had a thought of sending you an article about the assassination of President
 Kennedy. I thought it was a Monday, September 14, 1987 The Jerusalem Post Page Four

'The bullet that killed JFK was fired by a Secret Service agent'

Occupation: Private eye

The cable address on his business cards reads: "SLEUTH," Nicholas Beltrante, sixtyish, looking every inch an ex-cop, heads "Beltrante & Associates, Worldwide Professional Investigations" and has been called "the dean of American private eyes" by The Washington Post.

Beltrante, a former chief inspector of police in Washington, DC, spends most of his time overseeing the work of 22 associates. Occasionally, he takes on a case himself, charging $1,000 a day, "plus expenses." He charges $50 an hour (plus expenses) for the work of each of his associates, who keep $20 an hour for themselves.

Beltrante personally takes only cases "with very large fees" or of "great interest." He is currently investigating, together with ballistics expert Howard Donahue, the 1963 assassination of President John Kennedy. "Howard came to me four years ago and said: 'I have only $500. But read my report.'" Beltrante was initially very sceptical. "I took it up very reluctantly. It seemed far-fetched. But the report convinced me."

The 40-page Donahue report "showed" that - on the basis of analysis of remaining metal fragments - the bullet that struck Kennedy in the back of the head and killed him "could not have been fired from Lee Harvey Oswald's rifle. The wrong calibre."

Donahue determined that the bullet in fact came from a "special weapon" held by one of the Secret Service agents who was in the car behind the president's. "What happened was that after the first shot or shots the president's car jerked to a halt. The Secret Service car then came to an abrupt stop - and the Secret Service agent accidentally let off a shot, the shot that killed the president. But the administration refused to admit this as it would have discredited the agency whose job it is to protect the president."

Beltrante relates - "we know this for a fact" - that several weeks after the assassination, while driving in Texas, President Johnson stopped his car and told the Secret Service men in the car following: "Keep further back. I don't want to be a victim of a Secret Service agent."

Beltrante says: "We have determined which agent in the Kennedy backup car was responsible. He was retired from the service a year and a half later. He suffered an emotional breakdown." Beltrante attributes the breakdown to the assassination. "He hasn't worked since. He lives like a recluse. He refuses to answer the telephone. We have him under surveillance." He declines to give the name because of "possible libel actions."

He says that the "media, especially in the U.S., misrepresent the profession of private investigator. Their life-style as portrayed on television is far-fetched, exaggerated. It makes the profession look ridiculous."

contemporary detective fiction. His firm handles 750-1,000 cases a year, mostly "background investigations of people or businesses. I generally don't ask clients, 'Why do you want this done?'"

Beltrante says there are around 100,000 private investigators working in the U.S., and perhaps 150,000 worldwide. "It is a growing profession. But only about 100 of them are good, capable, serious, a handful in each country. We know each other. In Israel there are four or five."

Nonetheless, Beltrante believes the profession generally is steadily gaining recognition and respectability. "The CIA and the Justice Department now occasionally use private investigators on a contract basis." Beltrante himself has been so used by the Federal Trade Commission.

Is there a danger that a client will hire him for illegal purposes? "Look, the law allows us to investigate. I don't normally go into the 'whys.' He himself usually handles "short trading" cases - in which people or companies covertly and usually illegally buy out businesses."

In 1972 Beltrante was hired by the Committee to Elect Senator George McGovern for President to investigate the Watergate burglary. "The burglary was on June 17, my birthday. A few days later, I was hired. I was asked to determine who was responsible and why."

Beltrante's investigation ran concurrently with several police and federal investigations. "At that time, politicians didn't trust the federal law enforcement agencies and the police. For example, I was asked by Congresswomen Bella Abzug to see if her office phones were tapped [by the authorities] - and they were. That's why I was hired."

After a four-month investigation, Beltrante "discovered that Gordon Liddy's men - some of whom it was later found were implicated in Watergate - had rented rooms near the offices of the Committee to Elect McGovern. We also discovered the McGovern committee had been infiltrated [by Liddy men] who wanted to get hold of their records. Yes, we had the names."

Beltrante recalls that Washington Post reporters Carl Bernstein and Bob Woodward worked with him during the investigation. "We exchanged information, though I know they didn't give me everything they had, just as I didn't give them everything. They sent me the first signed copy of All the President's Men."

Beltrante "firmly believes that Deep Throat was no specific person or source: "It was a combination of sources and contacts whom Bernstein and Woodward called Deep Throat."

Beltrante, who hails from Atlantic City, is president-elect of the Council of International Investigators, which has a ceiling of 300 investiga-

Beltrante, of Italian stock (his name means "brave warrior"), says that the "treatment of private detectives in literature is more realistic." He names Sam Spade in Dashiell Hammett's The Maltese Falcon as a good portrayal of the trade. Raymond Chandler? "Good, definitely." But Beltrante isn't up on