The treaty, now intended as evidence of President John-son's policy of "bridge-building" between East and West, was signed on June 1, 1964, but never ratified by the Sen- portance to "the Convention

Approved by the Senate Committee on Aug. 3, 1965, on a 19-to-5 vote, the treaty has been sidetracked primarily because of an opposition campaign based on testimony given by Hoover. The attack has been led by the rightwing Liberty Lobby.

The FBI Director told a House Appropriations Committee on March 4, 1965, that, as Rusk noted in a Sept. 14, in each country, on a basis 1966, letter to Hoover, the establishment of Soviet consulates in this country would carefully-phrased, 57-word re-make the FBI's work "more ply, said that "upon closely make the FBI's work "more Rusk's letter to Hoover, however, omitted mentioning that Hoover's testimony also characterized the signing of the treaty as "a cherished goal of the Soviet intelligence services . . .

Rusk's letter went on to reiterate that the treaty granted no blanket right to establish consulates, and "We would expect initially to see established perhaps one consulate of reciprocity.'

On Sept. 16, Hoover, in a examining the contents" of Rusk's letter, Hoover found "you are basically correct with respect to your interpretation of my testimony . . ."

"The facts as mentioned in the second paragraph of your letter are, therefore, correctly stated," Hoover said. That referred to the paragraph in which Rusk said he did not interpret Hoover's remarks as opposition" to the treaty.
