

Dear Raphaela,

12/10/93

As I told David when I phoned yesterday, the pages you sent me end with 455, which is a half-page. That leaves the balance of Chapter XXI through XXXII for me to go over. I gave David several pages that were missing. I do not now recall whether I told him ~~sent~~ ^{that} in XIV 342 and in XV 436 also were missing. They are.

For a first experience with a computer you have done, I think, very, very well.

But as I indicated immediately, there are problems and some took me time and will take much time from Richard if you do not master them in the retyping. To save time all around, particularly Richard's when he edits, I suggest that you also have a better concept of style. That may also save time in copy editing.

And have explained to you how you get italics. There was not a single one, all being replaced by caps.

Another point that may represent a problem for Richard in editing is that when you switched to the second system, which gave the appearance of printed rather than typed copy, the margins were smaller, with very little on the right. I do not know that he will need more space in editing but I raise this in the event he might.

Not indenting for paragraph beginnings might require consultation with the rough draft in retyping because there sometimes is no extra space and because a new page does from time to time begin with a flush new sentence.

Those extra caps where not intended reminded me of my own and unsuccessful effort to be able to use an electronic typewriter. All sorts of things I did not intend were on the paper!

For a first time I think you did very well. I do appreciate how difficult this was, particularly because the copy was so dirty and hard to read, and I do thank you for it, for the considerable effort when it was so difficult.

Best wishes,

Harold
