Globe News

Dear George,

Last night's evening news took me back 35 years, to when I was part of the official investigation of Harlan, to one of the more shameful periods of our history and one of the more colorful, to what in my magazine writing days would have made quite a story.

Now I younger and with less planned and researched work, I'd do a book on it. In part I write you on the chance you think there could be some TV interest in telling an untold story and in recording a history that is recorded only officially. I have the records of our investigation and know where those of the other are available.

I also have other purposes. I was always too busy to keep a journal. There are now several oralists interested in my work for officials in government in earlier. If anything some of this can help to record recollections of those things of which I was part. This can serve as notes for that purpose. It will record a fragment of the background and experiences that influenced and made some of the work of men immediate scholarly interest. (I was a Senate Investigator between my newspaper and magazine days and before becoming part of intelligence during World War II.) And if it does not interest you or suggest this for TV who might be interested, maybe it will interest those like of whom I have heard from time to time on radio, telling them what they neither hear nor see in Georgetown.

In the 1930s Harlan was almost an equivalent of Vietnam. With a population of about 50,000 among whom almost pure Whitefeather English was not unknown the annual rate of murders was higher than that of all of New York State. Assassination of those who would organize the union and of political candidates was not unknown, nor were pitched battles over polling places and ballot boxes. Almost all the murders were from ambush.

One of the more original plots conceived by the coal-operators' association was getting rid of the communists organized brought in from Indiana. Peggy Dwyer, as called because he had lost a leg. All the gun things were doctored. The operators' chief thug was really named Jim Hartman. He was given $200 to kill Peggy, who walked out of the next county to the west, Bell. Hartman was also given the dynamite needed. But he figured why the hell should he take any chances when he could subcontract the job. So he did, for half what he had been given. There was then a chain of four-thifties who figured it the same way until Charlie Pachett, who had been given $100 for the job, got E.G. Packett to do it for $10.00. That wing of the hotel went straight up in the air when Peggy was in bed. And what actually happened is that the metal had turned over in the air, coming down on top of Peggy, perforating her. He was unscathed. And nothing happened to anyone else, either, not even after we took confessions under oath.

In fact, one of the operators, Ted Gandy, threatened a Senate witness in the toilet on the northeast corner of the third floor of the Old Senate Office Building and was indicted for it. The operators were experienced in finding juries and they found that one in Washington, D.C. I was a witness in that trial. The same method was used a few months later, when the Department of Justice followed up with criminal charges against something more than 60 corporations and individuals. For all this violence and murder, it seems odd that the case was known as U.S. v. Harry Kalen et al., but that was the name of the first mining corporation in the indictment.

The trial was about 100 miles north and I think a bit west of Harlan, in Union, Laurel County, where the population, when court was not in session, was 1910, according to the road signs. I was the only one connected with the government who walked around alone and unarmed. Nearly each morning I took a three-hour walk in the mountains with an old lawyer who had been lieutenant governor of West Virginia. But he carried a pre-juice and whittled as we strolled in the mountains before breakfast. I made local friends, easier for a 24-year-old where the federal government was not popular. And I knew in the official party we met from the Department of Justice or the FBI, so I had local sources of everything from horses to information. (It was a dry county and I was also the official party's spokesman when the bootleggers' prices got too high. I ran it from Lexington, Ky., or Jenkins, Tenn., in an old unused "office" of the Department's.)

When my sources told me when and how the jury was fixed and nobody from Washington would believe such a thing could happen, I decided it was time to return to the job at the Senate from which the Department had borrowed me because I knew most about the subject. I served as their expert on such things as dinner train subpoenas, something like the Washington people didn't expect followed immediately upon my departure, six miners, of course hitting each other. I was the only one who knew how they came to pass and I was safely away only hours before the first of them. It and details of the personal lives of some who later became famous are the only parts of the story I can't tell.

It was like wild west. One Sunday, before we left Marion for Union, the late John McElroy, who was shooting near it when we heard a noise, whipped the door of my hotel room open and there with his gun to it was a deputized thug, Mr. Hickey, with a .45 on each hip. Hickey was later a Senator and father of the atomic energy act. He was then assistant A.G. in charge of the Criminal Division.

Before the FBI agents proved it, while there was but one, the lawyers and me, we had a chauffeur who got so scared of being blown up when he turned the switch on that he went on an unbridled drunk. We had to spirit him out of Marion - while being watched by the three deputies who were looking for local charges they could pin on us. Wally E. Hopkins, an assistant A.G. later hired by John Lewis as his general counsel when I was asked to prosecute, Walter Gallagher, the youngest D.J. lawyer, and I did it with that covered "kid."

With these two stories it is my intention to give a little of the conditions under which the federal prosecution worked as much as local color.

The conditions of the miners, especially those even suspected of wanting the union, today seem incredible. Crime was almost an official monopoly and miners were not by any means but by the operators, through the machinery of company towns. The operators were also without sympathy for each other if one was suspected of attempting to Washington. I remember the unnamed lawyer for Peabody Coal and his engineering a mine explosion in my town of Jenkins. Within days Peabody's Jenkins mine was broken and burned.

Miners were not paid enough to live on as they were always in debt to the company store, whose prices were always exceptionally high. They were paid in scrip, not money, and could spend it at the company store only. They were never out of debt and could not even move when they were in debt. Besides, the operators owned all the mines.

Perry Mathias, who ran the Marion-Mallison Coal Co., a small man who looked like a Central Casting job on a Marion showman, was probably the most efficient in silencing his own payroll. He had a real checkoff, a book for a stuffed turkey, a book for a chance on a week of a car, etc. Any employee who complained was beaten up, pronto. And each employee was denied for each turkey sufficed weekly.

Tom Lamm was called "Uncle Tom" because he had none of the attributes of an uncle except grey hair. He had the Marion equivalent of Tiger Gage at his mine; perhaps John as I remember under the steps of either the offices or the company stores. He was the law, 100% of it.

There was an authentic hero, a log preacher/miner actually named Marshall Masick. Not that many were not heroes. Just living there was herculean. But these until-then mountain-born people rarely left. From the persistence of the Ethanbetherian speech, Masick was beaten up and crippled. He probably held the record for beatings survived. Once he was kicked along a railroad track and beaten with, gunshots until he was though dead. But he stayed and preached and organized. He didn't even take his family out of Marion until his house was shot up by a mob of "deputies." As I recall after all these years, some of his kids were killed in bed and he took his wife and surviving kids to Tennessee and then returned to continue spreading the word.

Merely living in Marion and working in the mines were acts of personal heresies then.

The operators could operate this tyranny because of their political control of the coal areas. It was enough to control Kentucky elections.

One of their lawyers and one of the leading defense lawyers at the trial was John Y. Brown. You may remember there is currently a politician/entrepreneur of this name. I think it is his son. Among the others in the government party who later became modestly famous were Harry Schlesinger, later a judge. His widow, Margaret, is prominent in Fayette County politics. J.H. McElroy, a Northern lawyer and like most, a devout Catholic, was the FBI agent in charge. He switched to Justice from the FBI because of the fine impression he made on Nixon, who was the protégé of Homer Cummings, then A.G. (and later a friend of mine.) Nixon was to buy his Forest home House when he was vice president. Jim rose to chief of the Lands Division, later Criminal. He was a fine guy and we became good friends. He taught me what I have forgotten, how to take his automatic pistol apart and put it together again blindfolded, so I could ride shotgun for him when there was no agent to do it. They worked in pairs. And there were times when I crouched behind the door of the car pointing that pistol to cover Jim when he walked up to the door of a mountain house. Shifting days for a 24-year-old!

No reporters were present until the trial started. Ray Daniels, of the Times, had a house where most of our parties were held. They were sometimes pretty wild. One night when I was working and not there a journalistic eminence of the day pursued a reluctant secretary with such vigor he broke her leg. All the reporters were so drunk one of the other women phoned me. There was no doctor of the few in the area who was home. The only help I could get her was a vet! (I was surprised that the agent with whom she slept did nothing about this incident but I suppose that would have let his wife know.) At one of the early parties the Irishman from the New York Daily News made a crack about Hoover. He was yanked the next day, replaced by a man who was a different cut when he became a Washington columnist, George Kline. He was then our "radical" and most improbably, had quarters with a prostitute whose home was at the corner of Divinity and Schubert. George wore his hair then almost as an Afro.

The way in which the jury was fixed was simple and effective even with sequestration. The operators bought up mortgages. It was not hard to let this be known through one of those guarding the jury. One of them men was one of my sources. Another was the clerk of the federal court. He and I became good friends. He trusted me when he did not trust the lawyers and agents. He was a nice guy who was trusted by the other local nice guys.

My best local friend was a lawyer who remained a close friend for years after he had to leave and until his marriage soared. He came from one of the more famous families. He was a Clay. Unlike the rest of his family, which represented power, he took the name of the poor, which meant he could have no other practice. He got paid any way people could pay him. The land on which he built his home was a fee. $6 was most of the construction work and the materials. He was the local force for downey. Somehow he acquired three small weeklies in the area, The London Times, The Manchester Guardian and one more modestly named, The Mount Vernon Sentinel. Manchester was in the heart of feuding country. Once when he was away defending an unpopular client for the ACLU in Lexington his wife asked me to drive over the Manchester with her to try and collect some money owed them. She feared if he did it they would shoot him. Penobscot, too. But not a woman. And she was a pretty Portuguese woman he had met in college in California. I remember that well because when the London paper had to go to press she needed more copy. One of the stories I wrote was of the night before's second Louis-Schmeling fight. (My head was "Joe still champ; Max still Schmeling." Oh, the grammar!)

This friend was hipped on the ancestor for whom "champion Ali was named, not Henry. Genius Clay was quite a man, an abolitionist editor in slave territory. Lincoln sent him as ambassador to Russia to save his life after he had won about as many fights as one man could expect to survive. He'd make a helluva movie, with the L-vated the reality. He had to leave Russia because of an affair with a woman in the Czar's family.

I wonder as I remember and I must get to work.

Another item in yesterday's news carried no back, but only four years. You may remember, in the context of the Kleindienst plan plan-bargaining, the documents I gave you and others proving he was a practicing liar. They were attached to the complaint in the first of my Freedom of Information suits, none ever reported. They have the same record on Mitchell and even include my unanswered and unpunished charges of official perjury. I often wonder if what happened would have been different if there had been any exposure of this official dishonesty and corruption of which I did have and did provide evidence. Really proof. I got an also unreported summary judgment in that first case. (But they still Bushwhacked figured in them officially and I believe unofficially the guy who has just said that when Justice defends Nixon it isn't defending him, Irving Jaffe. I know Jaffe is part of the story that includes your ongoing quest, for JFK's brain.) I have another one filed now, also ignored, in which the unreported record is overloaded with the same and I think crosses into both perjury and subversion. With my earlier experiences I do nothing to attract attention to these suits, being able to afford neither the time nor the cost when there is no apparent interest in them. I am content to serve serious purposes and to build a record that may have value only in history. And maybe some day a federal judge will get upright over somebody other than me.

This one has the potential. And the second one is before the Supreme Court for cert. It will be presented under the investigation/exemptions exemption. The government has just asked for its second extension. How the press could have ignored what Bausch wrote in his decision I still can't understand. His First-Amendment concept is that a writer should be forever forbidden from taking inquiry. Or, prior restraint is a blessing. His last words, in caps, were I think unique in a decision, Requirement in peace. And he was no JFK partisan, either.

Well, I hope I haven't bored you.

And thanks for the transcripts I asked for.

Mineshally,

P.S. The last time I was in Marlan was the week after World War II started. The USW then had a resident organizer who has just reached the end of his career a sick, crippled and ruined man, George Bitler. George had the guts to stay in Marlan town. And he made the best Pennsylvania Dutch sauer kraut and ribs I ever tasted, topped off with a grape pie. Sound like a guy that tough? I made the one stop in Marlan, for lunch and a visit, and was certain to get to Bristol before sundown. That was only two years after the kilometer started killing themselves and some of their friends might have figured out how it all started.
