

Carl Kaysen To Succeed Oppenheimer

The next director of the Institute for Advanced Study will be an academic and Harvard professor who has served the White House.

Oppenheimer will continue from the post he held since 1947.

In 1961, Kaysen was called to the White House to head the study on the impact of nuclear war.

He has also served as a member of the National Security Council and as a member of the President's Council on Science and Technology.

From 1963 to his post as associate dean of the Graduate School of Public Administration, he has been a member of the Board of the President's Council on Science and Technology.

He has also served as a member of the National Academy of Sciences and as a member of the National Research Council.

In 1950, his appointment was announced by the President. He had been a member of the Council of the President's Council on Science and Technology.

No one can deny the responsibility of finding a successor to a director of such eminence and impressive achievements as Dr. Oppenheimer.

Dr. Kaysen's appointment is a reflection of the high regard in which he is held by the scientific community and the public.
