DENVER, March 28—A doctor for lobbyist Dita D. Beard has complained that she was interviewed by a journalist in her hospital room here late Thursday night "without my knowledge or consent."

Dr. Louis M. Radetsky, the osteopath treating Mrs. Beard for a heart ailment, said Monday night in an interview with The Washington Post that "I knew nothing about" her interview with a correspondent for Time magazine.

Radetsky, who has turned away all requests for press interviews with Mrs. Beard, noted that she suffered a mild attack of angina pectoris last Friday, the day after the interview with Time.

That was two days before a special subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee began questioning the 53-year-old lobbyist for International Telephone and Telegraph Corp. in her hospital bed here.

Mrs. Beard's testimony ended abruptly Sunday afternoon, when she had a severe attack of angina, or chest pains, in the presence of six U.S. senators.

Radetsky explained that Mrs. Beard's attacks seemed to be "a build-up of all events . . . Nobody knows exactly why these things happen."

He said that because he wanted to avoid any undue stress on Mrs. Beard, he would not consider it safe for her to be interviewed on any subject until after she is released from the hospital next week.

"In light of Sunday's events," Radetsky added, "interviews would be difficult and possibly dangerous while she is in the hospital."

Previously, Mrs. Beard's doctors and lawyers had said that no interviews could be granted until after she had testified before the Senate subcommittee.

But one of the lobbyist's lawyers, David W. Fleming, said today in a telephone interview from his office in Van Nuys, Calif., that he had arranged the interview with Time after the magazine "had approached me several times."

Fleming said that under the ground rules with Time, no questions were permitted about an ITT memorandum allegedly written by Mrs. Beard, which linked Justice Department settlement of antitrust cases against the corporation to ITT's pledge of at least $200,000 to the Republican National Convention in San Diego.

The lawyer said he was present throughout the interview, lasting about 45 minutes, to enforce that condition. "She was feeling pretty well that night," he added, "so I had no objection."

In her conversation with Time, reported in this week's issue, Mrs. Beard described her early life and said her job with ITT "got better and better—it was beautiful until those sons of bitches pulled this one on me." Time said that was apparently a reference to columnist Jack Anderson, who published the disputed memo, and his associate, Brit Hume.

She also referred to the senate subcommittee as "that bunch of little bums coming out here."

Fleming insisted that he had told Dr. Radetsky in advance that "there would be a short chat. It must have slipped his mind."

He said that Mrs. Beard is also scheduled to do "a few minutes taping" next Saturday morning in her hospital room with CBS correspondent Mike Wallace.

Wallace, he said, "is an old friend of hers, and she usually has some strength in the morning."
