

A WORLD OF PEOPLE

William Kunstler says recent disclosures about John Kennedy and Robert Kennedy have made him feel the nation may be better off without them. "They were dangerous men," the attorney said at a news conference in Dallas. "If I could wish them back to life, I wouldn't." Kunstler said he is not "entirely upset" about the assassinations of the president and attorney general. "I think that in many ways, while I wouldn't have done it, in many ways, two dangerous men were eliminated," Kunstler said. "The only difference between others and the Kennedys is that the Kennedys excited this adulation, and adulation is the first step to dictatorship." Kunstler said he does not know or care if the assassinations were the result of conspiracies. "Dead presidents, you know, aren't worth very much," he said.

WILLIAM KUNSTLER

Arthur A. Fletcher, who resigned in anger from the Nixon administration, has been appointed deputy assistant for urban affairs under President J. Fletcher served in 1970 and 1971 as assistant secretary of labor but resigned in protest over Nixon's economic policies. The White House had picked Fletcher for the post of assistant secretary of the etc.

Anne Armstrong, President Nixon's former White House counsel, has been approved by the Senate as ambassador to Britain. Mrs. Armstrong, a Texas and long-time political figure, is