Chapter One

ON THE DEATH OF GREAT MEN

by Mark Lane

Nine years ago Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., the greatest civil rights protagonist in modern American history, was murdered in Memphis, Tennessee. Subsequently James Earl Ray was arrested and charged with the crime. Ray insisted that there had been a conspiracy and that after Dr. King's death he discovered that he had been an unwitting implement of that conspiracy.

No trial, or other public proceeding, has occurred since April 4, 1968, the day Dr. King was killed, which permits us to evaluate the evidence in the case. Ray entered what he has referred to, not without some supporting evidence, as an induced plea of guilty. A prearranged and rehearsed hearing was conducted without cross-examination or challenge by the defense. It raised more questions than it answered. Ray publicly contended, much to the embarrassment of his own lawyer, the Tennessee Attorney General, and the trial judge, that there had been a conspiracy to kill Dr. King. No one asked him what he meant nor asked him to elaborate.

In this book, Ray's explanation of that provocative assertion will be explored. I have spent many hours with him at Brushy Mountain Penitentiary in Petros, Tennessee. I was the first person to visit him there and I have met with him there for several hours as recently as February 1977. His view is presented here, as are the results of my own investigation into his allegation. Ray is an intelligent and articulate man not without a sense of humor, some of it self-directed, some of it poured upon those who have assessed his role in the murder. I think that the reader will only be able to evaluate Ray's participation in the events of April 4, 1968, in Memphis after hearing Ray's account of the events and when that exposition is placed in its full context.

The troubling events surrounding the murder of Dr. King encompass much that is beyond the range of perception or knowledge of James Earl Ray. A minor publishing industry developed after the murder. Much of the work it produced did little more than obfuscate the essential truth, through the promulgation of an army of irrelevant data and flawed reasoning.

With the exception of the incipient investigation of the murder by the Select Committee on Assassinations of the House of Representatives the only examination of the events in the nine years that have passed is a secret inquiry conducted primarily by a police agency that vowed to destroy Dr. King. Such an investigation can hardly be expected to win the confidence of the American people. It is, therefore, not surprising that just before this book was completed a national poll conducted by George Gallup disclosed that fewer than one out of five Americans believed the official version of the events—that James Earl Ray was the lone assassin of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

That is why Dick Gregory and I decided that this book must be written now. So much new and profoundly disturbing evidence has come to light since 1968—some of it uncovered by Greg, some by me, some by other investigators—that the matter cries out for reconsideration by the most eminent of all juries, the American people.

Greg and I decided to divide the task of preparing the manuscript along purely practical lines. Greg knew King—was deeply involved in his work. I, on the other hand, had ready access to extensive documentation through the files of the Citizens Commission of Inquiry, which I now head. So it was decided that Greg should be primarily responsible for writing the first part of the book, the part dealing with Martin Luther King and events leading up to his murder, and that I should be primarily responsible for the later parts of the book, those dealing with the murder and its aftermath.

Through the work of Dick Gregory, Martin Luther King becomes alive again for the readers of this book. Greg stood with Dr. King in Birmingham and in a score of other cities throughout the Deep South, and in the Deep North of Chicago as well. Dr. King's assassination was a moment of history that traumatized this country, for in his life he was for a moment the conscience of mankind. Greg's work and Martin's words remind us again that not just a symbol died that day in Memphis. A man who could think, and inspire, and lead, and love, and be hurt was killed.

My task was different from Greg's. I have undertaken to tell the story of some particularly significant events that preceded the murder, to relate the evidence that we have uncovered about the murder, and to describe the efforts to suppress information that leads inexorably toward the prime suspects in the murder.

If the American people are not satisfied with the official rendition of the events, then they evidently spurn as well the quasi-official efforts by writers Ray refers to as "novelists." Who are these writers, and why might they have chosen to ignore some of the relevant evidence?

The death of great men often leaves behind a tumultuous wake that may inundate those who have stood too close to the event, or who may have inadvertently seen too much. In this case witnesses who lived in the rooming house from which the shot was presumably fired were unintentional witnesses to that moment of history. The rooming house was, if not what unkind fiction writers refer to as a flophouse, something akin to it. Those who were forced by events to live there were, for the most part, ill prepared to withstand societal pressures designed to alter their testimony, to forget their unmistakable observations, and to remain silent about official discrepancies. One of them, perhaps potentially the most important witness of all, remains today—nine years after the event—in a Tennessee mental institution which she said she was placed in as punishment for seeking to tell the truth.

In life as in drama, minor characters may be swept away by great events they do not understand and cannot even begin to comprehend. The real actors in the drama of Memphis, messengers who felt called upon to relate what they had seen, suffered grievously; some are suffering still. For those of us who were not witnesses that day, the suffering is of a different nature and of a different degree. We suffer still from the injury done to our right to know about events that have been contrived to shape our lives. If a major political and social leader may be murdered without a proper inquiry into the circumstances, our constitutional rights are in jeopardy. We have the power, I am convinced, to influence our own collective destiny. First, I believe, we must secure and understand the facts.

This book, we hope, will contribute to that body of knowledge essential to the mastering of the relevant evidence. Only when we know what things are may we hope to transform them into what they should be. Humans possess that unique ability. William Hazlett perhaps said it best:

Man is the only animal that laughs and weeps; for he is the only animal that is struck by the difference between what things are and what they ought to be.

Chapter Two

NINE YEARS AGO

by Dick Gregory

Martin Luther King and I fought together on the battlefield for human justice. This is where I learned to respect him as a leader, to admire him and love him for what he was doing for humanity. Martin had a tremendous influence on my life, on my commitment to nonviolence, and my commitment to the struggle for human justice.

A convention of frozen food executives at the Playboy Club in Chicago started me on the road to fame in show business. My new status led to my first involvement in the civil rights movement of the 1960s.

I was a participant in most of the "major" civil rights demonstrations of the early sixties, including the March on Washington and the Selma-to-Montgomery March. During these marches, I was called an outside agitator so many times I went to check out my birth certificate to make sure I wasn't born in Iceland or someplace else. And the FBI used to infiltrate all of our marches, but we could always spot them by looking at their feet. Like whoever heard of walking fifty miles wearing patent leather shoes and white socks!

Under the leadership of Dr. King, I became totally committed to nonviolence, and I was convinced that nonviolence meant opposition to killing in any form. I felt the commandment, "Thou Shalt Not Kill," applies to human beings not only in their dealings with each other—through wary, lynching, assassination, murder, and the like—but in their practice of killing animals for food and sport. Animals and humans suffer and die alike. Violence causes the same pain, the same spilling of blood, the same stench of death, the same arrogant, cruel, and brutal taking of life.

I, along with millions of other blacks, was born into the world accepting certain negatives. I expected to be treated as less than a human being. Martin made the suffering and problems we blacks had undergone through so many years clamor for attention. He made it clear that we no longer had to accept a condition of servitude and second-class citizenship.

The moments I spent with Martin were many things. They were pleasant, stimulating, honest, and humorous. He enjoyed my jokes. Through him I was able to meet, associate with, and exchange ideas with many others who shared our concerns and convictions. My only regret is that my moments with him were not more relaxed. There was rarely an opportunity for lazy, reflective conversation. Either a demonstration beckoned, or I was rushing to entertain at some fund-raising event—or both.

I watched Martin as he grew large and vital on the American scene. And I watched and listened as a few powerful Americans attempted to make the world believe that what he was doing was wrong—that he was “picking on” America. They fought back by accusing Martin of being everything except what he really was—one of the most brilliant, dedicated, and admired spokesmen and leaders for the fight to gain humanity that this world has ever known. The FBI hated King with a passion. A clever criminal could have called the FBI and told them that King was organizing a march on one side of town, waited five minutes for all the agents to get there, and then have an open season robbing the banks on the other side of town.

I watched Martin as he dealt with issues concerning the plight of the poor and oppressed. I watched as he dealt with violence and injustice in America, and as he pointed out the country's lack of moral leadership. Then I saw him become the conscience of America.

Today, nine years after his death, Martin Luther King, Jr. is still the conscience of America. I shall never forget how upset America was when he began his vigorous, adamant, and extremely vocal opposition to the Vietnam War. Through him I came to understand that a commitment to nonviolence is more than marching for a cause and singing “We Shall Overcome,” or turning the other cheek when one was slapped by a Southern sheriff.

Clearly, those who feared for King's life and safety were not paranoid. His violent death in Memphis is proof. And the “white folk watchers” in the black community have been ever and acutely aware of what Mr. Charlie will and will not tolerate. When King left off antagonizing bigots and Klansmen and began attacking defense spending and pointing out the inconsistency between claiming to be a Christian country and committing unspakable atrocities in Vietnam, they saw the gauge on the social Geiger counter go wild. Danger! Danger! Danger! was the only possible interpretation.

King, they felt, had crossed that invisible line separating black folks' business from white folks' business. The governmental policy makers, the industrial giants, the shakers and movers of American society do not use public accommodations. It was barely relevant to them whether or not blacks were served at Woolworth's counter, of where they sat on the bus. King was no longer a darky preacher leading the country in a rousing prayer meeting. He was attacking the power elite.

Nine years have lapsed since the assassination of Martin Luther King. Sufficient time has passed to make it possible for one to look back realistically at Memphis, April 4, 1968, to scrutinize the events that led to a motel balcony, to a sniper's shot, and culminated with a life and promise felled, a dream deferred.

It may be debatable that time heals wounds, but there is no doubt that it does place events in proper perspective, allowing one to study them without the drama and emotion of the moment, which must inevitably color them.

Momentous changes have occurred on the American scene. The Vietnam War is over. Richard Nixon was catapulted to the Presidency and then toppled by Watergate. Bobby Kennedy and J. Edgar Hoover, respectively King's staunchest ally and most bitter foe, are dead now, as is Lyndon Johnson who was tortured by the same war—if for different reasons.

Yes, it has been nine years since that fateful day, April 4, 1968. Let us move back in time until we are there.

I was in the State of California, campaigning for the Presidency of the United States and lecturing at various colleges. Earlier in 1968 I had become a write-in candidate for the nation's highest office, with Mark Lane as my running mate.

At a little after 4 P.M. that day, California time, I was driving with a friend to Hartnell College where I was scheduled to deliver a lecture. Our conversation was interrupted by a radio bulletin. Martin Luther King had been shot in Memphis!

I began to remember Martin, clearly, vividly. I remembered his sweet innocence and his warm, gentle smile. I thought of the time when he and I had been riding on a plane and he expressed concern about my personal safety.

“Now Gregory,” he said, “I want you to be careful. I'm just afraid they're gonna kill you.”

I answered, “If they do, Doc, will you preach my funeral?” He said, “I sure will.”

We continued our drive to Hartnell College in silence. Even now I can feel the numbness, still remember my disbelief.

Finally we arrived at the school. Standing up before an audience was the last thing I felt like doing that night. But, of course, I had to go out there and explain as best I could how I saw the situation. Many people were in the audience only because they wanted to know my thoughts, and my opinions of the day's events. They knew Martin and I were friends and that I held him in great esteem.

At my lecture that night I realized for the first time that America was in trouble with her young white kids. I was surprised to see the effect King had on them. They had grown up hearing about him, seeing him on television, and being influenced by his national presence. No matter what J. Edgar Hoover, or their own mommas and daddies may have said about King, these young white kids knew he was not wrong and he was not bad. Martin was a living denial of all the racist myths perpetrated in the white community about black folks. Martin didn't lie, he didn't cut, he didn't steal, and he wasn't on welfare. These young white kids learned some truths about black folks from Martin Luther King, and he had a more profound impact on their minds and lives than anything they had heard about the family dinner table.

Martin Luther King had become a victim of violence while preaching nonviolence and it raised a crucial question. When I heard the conclusive word of his death at my hotel that night, the question became even more compelling.

Would the concept of nonviolence, already under brutal attack by many blacks and whites, die with King? Would black awareness and black progress be buried with him? Would the tremendous strides toward awakening the conscience of America to the plight of the poor and the oppressed be halted? Had Martin lived and died in vain? Was it possible that violence had conquered nonviolence?

For the first time since the news of King's being shot, I smiled, a reflective smile, sad and bittersweet, and I recalled the words of Gandhi.

My creed for nonviolence is an extremely active force. It had no room for cowardice or even weakness. When a man is fully ready to die he will not even desire to offer violence. History is replete with instances where, by dying with courage and compassion on their lips, men converted the hearts of their violent opponents.

King had faced his attackers; he did not beg, or scream, or whimper. Martin Luther King, Jr., was laid to rest in the spirit which defined his days among us.

It was a poor folks' funeral, as sad as it was beautiful. I knew then there would never be another Martin Luther King, Jr., and further, that there did not need to be. A little bit of Dr. King resided in the heart and soul of every American. He had awakened it and brought it out into the open. He did what he had been placed on earth to do. There was no need for subsequent imitations of his life. America is a better place because Dr. King lived. History may prove him to have been his country's salvation.

Ironically, President Johnson was unable to attend Dr. King's funeral because he had to meet his generals and talk about Vietnam. Still I imagine the President spoke from the heart when he said, "We are shocked and saddened by the brutal slaying tonight of Dr. Martin Luther King. . . . I ask every citizen to reject the blind violence that has struck Dr. King, who lived by nonviolence."

I shall never forget the reaction of white America that night. The looks of horror, disbelief, embarrassment, and guilt. The haunting question was written on every face, "How will black folks react?" I saw it on California Governor Ronald Reagan's face on television. Black folks in California saw it too, and I really believe his tearful expression of personal shock and horror was largely responsible for keeping things cool in Watts.

The account of the assassination printed in The New York Times was typical of the press response throughout the country.

The 39-year old Negro leader's death was reported shortly after the shooting by Frank Holloman, director of the Memphis police and fire departments, after Dr. King had been taken to St. Joseph Hospital.

"I and all the citizens of Memphis," Holloman said, "regret the murder of Dr. King and all resources at our and the state's command will be used to apprehend the person or persons responsible."

The police broadcast an alarm for "a young white male," well dressed who was reported to have been seen running after the shooting. . . . Policemen poured into the area around the Lorraine Motel on Mulberry Street where Dr. King was shot. They carried shotguns and rifles and sealed off the entire block, refusing entry to newsmen and others.

Dr. King had been in his second-floor room throughout the day until just about 6:00 P.M. central standard time: 7 P.M. New York Time).

Then he emerged in a silkish-looking black suit and white shirt. He paused, leaned over the green iron railing and started chatting with an associate, Jesse Jackson, who was standing just below him in a parking lot.

Mr. Jackson introduced Dr. King to Ben Branch, a musician who was to play at a rally Dr. King was to address two hours later. As Mr. Jackson and Mr. Branch told of Dr. King's last moments later, the aide asked Dr. King:

"Do you know Ben?"

"Yes, that's my man!" Dr. King glowed.

They said Dr. King then asked if Mr. Branch would play a spiritual, "Precious Lord, Take My Hand," at the meeting that night.

"I really want you to play that tonight," Dr. King said. The Rev. Ralph Abernathy, perhaps Dr. King's closest friend, was just about to come out of the room.

A loud noise burst out.

Dr. King toppled to the concrete passageway floor and blood began gushing from a wound.

Someone rushed up with a towel to stem the flow of blood. Rev. Samuel Kyles of Memphis placed a spread over he fallen head of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. [Kyles was to have hosted a dinner for King and his associates that night before the rally.]

Mr. Abernathy hurried up with a larger towel. And then the aides waited, while policemen rushed up within minutes. In what seemed to be ten or fifteen minutes, an ambulance arrived.

"He had just bent over," Mr. Jackson went on bitterly, "I saw police coming from everywhere. They said, 'Where did it come from?' and I said, behind you. The police were coming from where the shot came."

Mr. Branch, who is from Chicago, said the shot had come from "the hill on the other side of the street." He added:

"When I looked up, the police and the sheriff's deputies were running all around. The bullet exploded in his face."

"We didn't need to call the police," Mr. Jackson declared, "they were here all over the place."

MARTIN LUTHER KING AND HIS MISSION

Chapter ~~One~~ Three

Timeline

CORETTA KING

by Dick Gregory

Born: January 15, 1929, a boy child in the city of Atlanta. A black boy child. Of course the birth record in Atlanta was different. They had to put, Born: A boy child. A negro. Few people on this planet were aware than on January 15, 1929 a boy child would be born on this planet earth to an environment, and to a family that would touch the spirit of this boy child to the extent that another spirit would develop. A boy child was born on January 15, 1929. His name was Martin Luther King Jr.

Martin Luther King reached the lives of each and every black person in America. He also affected the attitudes of nearly all white people living in America. He was loved and he was hated. His name and his face were known to just about every person living in the United States. He had been on the pages of every magazine and newspaper in the country. No other black person in America ever received as much attention in the media as Martin Luther King. The radio and television networks covered each and every demonstration led by King, and they followed the progress of the civil rights movement with dedication. Dr. King was a hero of the press. He was easily accessible to it and he always provided the dramatic impact that a hungry press is always anxious for.

At the height of the civil rights movement, one could easily detect the optimism that had swept through black communities around the nation. Phrases such as "Black is Beautiful" and "Hey Brother" became a part of the new sense of black pride. Black people in America were changing. Fear began to disappear from the hearts of many older folks living in the South; for the first time in their lives, many black men and women were not afraid to stand up for their rights, to say to white people what they would no longer tolerate. The end to segregation was a reality because of Martin Luther King. This one man had more impact on the attitudes of black Americans than any other person in contemporary history.

This is not the place to try to give a full-scale biography of Martin Luther King, and still less, the history of the black civil rights movement.

I'd rather try to convey what the man and the movement meant to black people in America. But a few dates and facts may be helpful as background. King was ordained a Baptist minister in 1947. A graduate of Morehouse College, he continued his education also attending Boston University and The Crozer Theological Seminary in Boston, Massachusetts, gaining a Ph.D. in 1955. In 1957, he received a D.D. from the Chicago Theological Seminary. By that time he had already sprung to national prominence for the leading part he played in the black boycott of buses in Montgomery, Alabama, in 1956. This nonviolent protest against the bus lines' mistreatment of black passengers resulted in the jailing of more than ninety black protestors including King. The local court naturally found King guilty. He appealed the decision. Meanwhile, the bus lines, which were going broke, dropped the charges. It was a great victory both for King, and for the principle of nonviolence.

The next year, an impressed Congress passed the first civil rights legislation since 1875, and Martin Luther King founded the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), the organization which was to be his main vehicle for promoting black civil rights in the years to come. Through the remaining years of the 1950s and the early 1960s, the SCLC, along with The Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) and the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC), with the blessings of the older, more established organizations such as National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) made the tactic of non-violent protests as familiar to Americans as their morning breakfast cereal.

In April of 1963, this movement reached a kind of crescendo when Dr. King led an enormous protest march in Birmingham, Alabama. More than 2,500 black demonstrators were arrested. Three months later he led an even bigger march in Washington, D.C. In terms of mass demonstrations, probably the high point of the civil rights movement was that march. I'll deal with both these dramatic events in greater detail in later chapters. Within a year, the most extensive civil rights legislation in United States history, The Civil Rights Act of 1964, had been enacted into law. That same year, King was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize.

During the next four years, King continued his struggle for equality on many fronts, but by 1968 he had become convinced that still another mass demonstration was needed. This was to be The Poor People's March on Washington. He was deeply involved in plans for this event when, in the spring of 1968, he interrupted his work to go to Memphis, Tennessee to lend his support to the striking sanitation workers there. On April 4, while standing on the balcony of his Memphis motel room, Dr. King was shot and killed. He had made the final sacrifice for the great cause to which he had devoted his life.

But then Martin Luther King had made many sacrifices during the period of time he spent organizing black people and leading demonstrations. He spent a lot of time away from his home in Atlanta, Georgia. His wife Coretta spent many nights alone with their four children. There was not much time for fun and recreation for a man who was putting his whole life into fighting for human rights. Every time Martin Luther King led a march, every time he felt the pain of a police nightstick against his body, and every hour he spent in jail helped black Americans wake up to the problems that existed and helped black America hold its head up high. It was a difficult time in Martin Luther King's life. There were many sleepless nights in strange hotels. There were thousands of strange phone calls and letters criticizing the civil rights movement. There were constant threats of death to Martin Luther King, members of his family, and many of his aides. Every day that Martin Luther King walked the streets, and every night when he lay down to rest, the reality of death was his shadow. But King learned to deal with the notion that death was a possibility, and he knew that fear would only make those around him afraid. King was not fearful of death, at least I can say that I never saw him show the strain and pressure that would normally burden a man faced with such grim prospects. It was his calmness and consistently positive attitude that made those around him feel comfortable. When word of possible danger was made known, Martin Luther King never panicked. He knew how to handle situations with whatever kind of tact was necessary. He was a master when it came to dealing with the pressures that were forever surrounding him. For these reasons, millions of people loved and respected Dr. King. Those who never got a chance to march in a demonstration or see King in person were with him in spirit. They knew him as their leader, and with the help of newspapers and television, Martin Luther King became the most well-known black person in America.

There were, of course, black Americans who felt that the black struggle might be more effective without King's nonviolent approach. Some of them tried to get King to change, but his beliefs were too strong for him to be swayed in any other direction. The efforts of these more radical civil rights advocates were short-lived. Allegiance to Martin Luther King was steadfast. Even though times when it seemed that nonviolence was ineffective, the people who believed in King's methods stood behind him. We used to get a kick out of hearing the Northern black guy who would say "I can't go down South because I'm too violent." Yet this cat was scared to talk back to his own white paper boy! It is ironic that

King's nonviolent movement brought on a violent reaction from much of white America. They were reacting to a type of attitude they didn't understand. America is accustomed to using violence as a tool to obtain whatever goal it is trying to reach, and for that reason it could not accept masses of black people acting peacefully in order to get their point across. Many whites felt Martin Luther King must have been planning something else. They just couldn't believe that this nonviolent approach was for real. Examples of the violence that stalked the nonviolent movement were throughout King's career. In January of 1956, less than two months after he became leader of the Montgomery, Alabama bus boycott someone threw a bomb onto the porch of his home; no one was hurt. Two days before Christmas in 1956, blacks and whites rode integrated buses together for the first time. An unidentified gunman fired a shotgun blast into the front door of King's home; there were no injuries. On January 27, 1957 someone threw a bomb on King's porch; it did not explode. On September 3, 1958 King was arrested and charged with loitering while on his way to a Montgomery, Alabama legal hearing involving his close friend and fellow civil rights advocate, Reverend Ralph D. Abernathy. On November 17, 1958, as Dr. King was signing copies of his new book Stride Toward Freedom in a Harlem bookstore, a black woman by the name of Mrs. Izola Ware Curry stabbed him in the chest with a steel letter opener, barely missing his heart. King was hospitalized for thirteen days in a Harlem Hospital. On May 21, 1961 a mob of 1,000 angry whites upset over the Freedom Rides menaced Dr. King and 1,500 blacks holding a meeting at the First Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama. The National Guard escorted the blacks back to their homes. On September 28, 1962, during a Southern Christian Leadership Conference convention in Birmingham, ~~the~~ ~~who~~ who described himself as a member of the American Nazi Party, hit Dr. King in the face twice, causing swelling and bruises. King did not press charges. ~~He~~ was fined twenty-five dollars and sentenced to thirty days in jail. On June 30, 1963, people who were displeased by his nonviolent policies, threw eggs at his car as King went to speak at a Harlem church. On June 18, 1964, Dr. King charged St. Augustine, Florida, police with brutality after they used cattle prods and beat people who tried to desegregate a motel. He asked President Lyndon B. Johnson to send in federal marshals. On January 18, 1965, as Dr. King registered at a previously all-white hotel in Selma, Alabama, ~~the~~ ~~member of~~ member of the National States Rights Party punched and kicked him ~~in the~~ ~~face~~. On August 5, 1966, as Dr. King led marchers past angry white residents of Chicago's Southwest Side, he was struck in the head by a rock. He stumbled, but continued to march. Later a knife thrown at him missed and struck a white youth in the neck. On April 4, 1968 Martin Luther King was killed.

The violence that confronted King from the time he first led the civil rights movement up to the time of his death convinced many blacks to abandon their nonviolent beliefs. Though violence produced only temporary gains, many blacks felt it was the right direction to take. They felt they had been patient too long. It was the white police reaction and response to the rioting and violence that forced many blacks to reconsider King's methods, although they knew that King's way was not just for the benefit of those living, but was aimed at affecting unborn generations of black people.

One of the traits that made Martin Luther King popular as a leader and as a newsmaker was his dynamic speaking ability. He was a brilliant man with a widely diverse educational background and the soul of a country preacher. King reached millions with his echoing voice that made one feel a chill just listening to him. His choice of words was always perfect. He taught the world that it was both morally wrong and psychologically harmful to hate anyone. He believed that hate did more harm to the hater than it did to the hated. He urged people to try to solve the racial problems of the world through love and goodwill. He told parents to teach their children to fight injustice with an open heart and with an open mind. Martin Luther King believed that this was the only solution to the problems that plagued black America.

Despite his constant struggle to unite blacks and whites through nonviolence, and though he lost his life trying, some whites in America refused to give Martin Luther King his due respect. On the day of his funeral in Atlanta, many retail stores did business as usual, completely ignoring the fact that one of the greatest men that had ever lived had been shot to death. Most of white Atlanta was completely uninvolved in the sorrowful memorial that was taking place that day. Two major department stores did close, but many blacks felt it was not out of respect for King, but because they feared violence might break out if they stayed open. Governor Lester Maddox allowed all state employees to go home from work at two o'clock in the afternoon for what he called "security reasons." Many city workers were not required to come in to work at all because their employers were trying to protect them from possible harm from angry blacks. But for blacks who had been around to see Dr. King fight for equality and to an end to segregation, it was a good feeling to see his nude-drawn coffin being pulled down the downtown streets, passing stores and restaurants that King himself had helped to integrate.

There are people who dedicate their lives to helping other people. We seem to take so much from them and give so little in return. We could always criticize Martin, but Martin never criticized the masses. He never complained that the crowds were not large enough, or that there weren't enough people supporting the cause in the black communities. But I guess that's part of being a leader; to lead a group of people who are so hungry for freedom and justice that all they see are the injustices and you. You weren't a man, you weren't a human being. You were something that wasn't supposed to get tired. You weren't supposed to get hungry, you weren't supposed to go to sleep, you weren't supposed to die. We need you; we need you here; we need you there. Hey Martin, come over here and help us. If you would just come they would listen to us. What about the other side? What about the family? Take a few minutes at home. Take the day off Martin, and rest. The family, no, we always forget about that. We talk about Mahatma Gandhi, but who was his wife? Who were his children? You were forced to give us so much. There was another side. There was a Coretta. There was a very warm side. There was Martin the father, Martin the husband. And it's like every other human being who meets another human being, and falls in love and gets married.

When Martin Luther King first met Coretta Scott they were both in Boston. It was 1951. She was twenty-four years old, fresh out of Antioch College and studying at the New England Conservatory of Music. King was working on his doctorate degree in theology at Boston University. After two years of dating, they were married. Coretta Scott had thought earlier, and had even said to her friends, that she and Martin would probably not think seriously of marriage. She was an accomplished concert singer and didn't think that being the wife of a minister would be her style. But, she soon changed her mind. They were married at her parents' home in Marion, Alabama. Their first child, Yolanda, was born two years later. Just two weeks after her birth, the Montgomery bus boycott began, and with it, the start of King's rapid rise to leadership and prominence. The couple's first son, Martin Luther King III, was born in 1958, followed by Dexter three years later, and Bernice in 1963. Coretta King spent a lot of time at home with the children during their preschool years. She spent her free time with local club work and singing with her church choir.

Coretta King was deeply involved in her husband's work. She taught their children about the civil rights movement and the importance of their father's involvement in it. She took her knowledge of the civil rights movement and expanded her own ideas. She was a member of the Women Strike for Peace movement where she, along with fifty other American women, went to the seventeen-nation disarmament conference in Geneva to encourage world peace. She even used her talents as a singer to benefit the movement. Not long after Martin Luther King was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize his wife said, "My life is either the church or the struggle for civil rights." Mrs. King did a series of cross-country freedom concerts which were solo singing engagements to raise money for the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. From 1965 until Martin Luther King's death, Coretta King barely saw a day pass without the threat of death surrounding her husband. She developed a philosophy that helped her live with the reality that he could be killed because of his commitment to the human struggle. She said, "If something does happen, it would be a great way to give oneself to a great cause."

Coretta King became involved in nearly every activity that her husband took part in; even after his death she continued to emphasize the need to carry on the movement. The Southern Christian Leadership Conference named her to its board of directors. Many felt that she would now emerge to carry on King's work. But those who knew Coretta King knew that she had always been out in front during all the demonstrations, during all the sit-ins, and throughout the entire movement. She was never just a behind-the-scenes companion. Coretta King was a strong, black woman who had long realized the necessity of her husband's work. She also knew the importance of her own association with it. She had stamina and patience. She was able to see ahead just as her husband did, to the time when injustice and segregation would be a thing of the past. It was this vision and the hope of a brighter tomorrow that allowed her to stand beside Martin Luther King in his fight for a better world.

Coretta King had suffered many periods of fear and grief long before her husband was killed. When King was stabbed she had flown to New York City to be with him. She always told the children what was going on, and she prepared herself for anything that could happen. She fully realized that danger was indeed a part of her husband's sacrifice.

Coretta King had become a well-known figure in the civil rights movement. Her name was a symbol of dignity, and her face mirrored the reflections of a woman dedicated to building her life around helping to solve the problems of the poor and the unfortunate. Coretta King's reputation was a hard worker with a genuine desire to keep the movement strong was evident as one read newspapers and listened to the news on television and radio. Reporters were beginning to mention her more and more, and many discovered that Coretta King provided a separate story, but one which would lead back to her husband. A story that would explain how important it was that she existed, how relevant she was to the entire civil rights struggle. Americans know who Martin Luther King's wife was because she made herself known through her involvement with him and with the movement. But it wasn't only this involvement that made her stand out. There were other wives of civil rights leaders who marched and demonstrated; even others who went to jail fighting for an end to segregation and racial inequality. I'm sure Coretta King helped to give these other wives strength and courage.

Chapter Four

KING AND KENNEDY CALL

by Dick Gregory

In May, 1963 I received a call from Martin Luther King asking me to come to Birmingham. Then I received a call from President John F. Kennedy, asking me not to go.

I was at the height of my show business career and my involvement in the civil rights movement had grown to the point where I had become aware of a lot of things I was never aware of before. In the early days of the civil rights movement, I would get phone calls to come down South and perform. I had all the normal fears that one would have about going into the South. I had been told about the Ku Klux Klan, but the connection between the KKK, and the police, and the federal agencies had never been established. I think that was probably the most horrifying thing for me to find out—that it wasn't just the Klan.

Then I really started realizing the problems that black folks have in the South. I mean, that once the arm of the law grabs you, there is no way out. They could make you say things that you didn't want to say. They could say, "We can do this to your family; we can do this to your mother; we can get your wife fired from her job; or your father fired; or you're going to lose your home." It's amazing that the black folks had the strength and courage to stand up and push, because in America's wildest imagination, we could hardly believe that many of the things that were happening, actually happened. America could see the beatings and the jailings, but the political maneuvers behind the scenes were just as vicious and they fascinated me almost as much as they bothered me. It fascinated me when I went South, as informed as I always thought I was. It was almost as if I was not an American black, but was living on another planet, listening to someone say, "This is the way they treat them people."

Of course, it didn't just happen where it was obvious, as in Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi; it happened all over the country. Probably the one big difference between the black reaction in the North and the black reaction in the South was that black folks in the North weren't scared to walk down the street. This is the reason that the civil rights movement wasn't as effective up North—because we tried to use the same tactics that they were using in the South. The tactic in the South was to get a large crowd to walk down the street, because black people there were scared to walk down the street alone. This same tactic was followed in the North; we could have used ninety percent of our energy doing other things.

We were really trying to get that crowd to improve the news coverage. The one thing the press always asked us was, "How many people do you think you'll have for the demonstration?" For the evening news they had certain deadlines, and so they would come up and ask us to demonstrate early so it could be on the evening news. The press was managing our affairs, making things happen.

There was a certain type of closeness, in a hostile way, between black and white folks in the South. The whites had to dislike blacks for what was going on, but in the process of change, blacks became human. The movement started exposing our feelings, and making us human to the whites. When you are ill and your body goes numb, and then you start healing, you start tingling and the numbness gives way to real feeling again. I looked at the events, at black people showing their feelings, and saw a certain amount of beauty because years from now it would be different.

I knew the effect that those Southern street demonstrations were having on the young white kids. They would say, "Mommy, how come they let us treat them like that?" There was no more saying, "Oh, they're happy." There was no more Beulah singing in the kitchen. The old black man who worked around the house used to smile because his true feelings were hidden from white America. Now those feelings weren't hidden anymore.

There was an individual emerging who was becoming more than just a leader to black folks. Martin Luther King was more than just a leader in America—he was recognized worldwide. I started feeling the power and the effect of Martin by the way people talked of him. As much as certain people in the system tried to put him down, they always dealt with him with respect because of the way he carried himself. He was always the same.

I had such respect for everybody in the movement, I would never go to a demonstration until I was asked, and I would always call the leadership so they wouldn't think they were infringing on me because they looked at me as a celebrity. When I would go some place, the cameras would go. I didn't want to go in without being officially invited. The first thing I would do, when I got into town, was brief myself, because the press would tend to walk away from the local leaders and start asking me questions. In the process of doing this, I became very familiar with situations. When I was picked up at the airport, they put it in my car—what's happening, who's in jail, what the situation is.

King asked me to come to Birmingham, and I said, "Yes, Martin, I'll come." There had been strong rumors that the Birmingham problem was about to be resolved. President Kennedy and the city officials had worked out a deal, and there was speculation that King might be jumping the gun and ruining the deal. But I felt good because I was tired of white folks working out deals for black folks and I felt that King had to be in Birmingham and had to lead that movement. Whatever deal might have been worked out was no more.

We were to come in and solve this problem. The big problem in Birmingham was the police—Sheriff Bull Connor among others—and they became one of the main issues.

Arthur Hanes, the mayor of Birmingham, wasn't an issue to me because I didn't confront his side of the city. I confronted the Bull Connor street demonstration side—the hoses. The fire hoses had a tremendous effect on me because I had always loved firemen, and I used to follow firemen. I felt that the fire departments in America were making a mistake not to disassociate themselves from the white government. This eventually proved to be true, because in the North, when the firemen answered an alarm in the black community, bricks were thrown at them—at black and white firemen. The firemen couldn't be disassociated from the hosing down South. You kind of expected it from the police, but not from firemen. Firemen always seemed to have been good guys.

Firemen and fire hoses have become symbolic of black repression. This is the first time it ever hit us blacks; it had never happened before. This was the first time hoses were used against us. They had been used often in America's history, for crowd control, but now they were used against people who had thought firemen were heroes. The force of the hoses would sweep those kids around the corner.

The most horrible photograph that came out of Birmingham was that of the dog biting the black man in the rump, grabbing his pants. They tell me that he was one of the few blacks who didn't get bitten. It just made a beautiful picture. All the dog got was the pants, but that picture had a most significant effect on black folks and their relationship with dogs. The older black person always had to have a dog. Someone had to be below you. To watch dogs kiss folks on television really turned off black folk, because we had to keep that dog a dog. The dog had to eat the scraps, the dog could never be caught up on the couch and the dog was the dog.

Until Birmingham, the largest percentage of false alarms turned in, in major cities in America, were in black communities. This was before black folks started outnumbering white folks all through the cities, and living in distinct areas. There was something so beautiful, peaceful, and competent about the firemen's attitudes that you'd put in false alarms just to have them show up. After Birmingham, the false alarms decreased considerably in the black communities; it became something that you didn't want to see. The firemen and dogs are just examples of the tremendous emotional impact of the events in Birmingham.

When I got the call from Martin and he asked me if I would come down, I said, "Yes, Martin, I'll come." I was always scared when I had to go into the South—not the type of scared so that you wouldn't go, but the type of scared knowing that it can be your last time; you can be killed. The FBI, and the local police, and the state police were so vicious that anything could happen. My secret ambition, when I was a kid, was to be an FBI agent. I thought that was the epitome—higher than a fireman—and then the whole scene crumbled. I could see the FBI doing illegal things. No one had to tell me about it; I watched it happening.

When I went into Birmingham, what a funny feeling—only white police met me and asked me a bunch of questions when I got off the plane. The hostility from the press was unbelievable. Black folks had always accepted the white press as being factual. We were never in it so we could never document it if it wasn't factual. Until the civil rights movement, during which we started seeing our news being twisted and turned around, with hostile, vicious headlines, we had believed in the white press.

All over the world, Birmingham was making front pages—but in Birmingham, the stuff wasn't on the front page, it was on page three or four. The front page was just business as usual.

I had told Martin I would be there, and that a very interesting thing had happened. I had gotten a call from President Kennedy, but wasn't at home at the time. It was really interesting because Lil, my wife, said when I came home, "Where have you been!" She never snapped at me like that. I said, "Well, why?" She said, "Because President Kennedy has been trying to get you—he's called this house three or four times." I said, "I don't want to talk to him." Lil said, "He said he's going to wait up at the White House until you call him." I said, "But it's three o'clock in the morning, he's not going to wait up, no way, he's probably got a tie line anywhere he is—you really think he's waiting up in the White House?" She said, "Yes, I talked to him personally and he told me it is very important that he talk to you." So I said, "I don't want to talk to him anyway." I was getting ready to go to bed and she really had an attitude. She said, "Well, you're not going to bed—you're not going to sleep." I really don't want to say I was drunk, because my life had changed so much, but I was. I'd been out drinking all day and Lil said, "Well, you're not going to sleep until you call the President."

Many years later, when Gerald Ford was in the White House, a call came from the White House; I wasn't home. About a week later a letter came from the White House saying they had called, that the President had wanted to ask Dick Gregory about something, and Lil said, "Oh, God, I can't believe I forgot the White House. I meant to tell you the White House had called!" I thought about the time Kennedy had called. I said to Lil, "I would never have thought that there would be a day the White House would call and you would just forget about it." I guess that's growing up, or whatever you would call it.

I had to call President Kennedy, though, that night. The note said, "Call Operator 18, Washington, D.C., the White House," and so I called Operator 18. I really was surprised, because when I said, "Dick Gregory," Kennedy said, "Oh, yes, Dick, I've been waiting for your call. I have a problem and I wonder if you'll help me with it?"

Martin had announced that I was going to Birmingham. President Kennedy said, "Do me a favor and don't go down to Birmingham, because I feel that Dr. King is wrong. We reached a settlement there, and everything is going to be fine—your going there will create problems." So I said, "I know Dr. King, and I know a lot of things are changing in the South that never started changing until Dr. King got involved. So I told Dr. King I'm coming down, and I'm going down, and I don't think he would have called me if he didn't need me and the last person who is going to put me in a trick is Dr. King." The President said that he wished that I wouldn't go. Then he said, "Why don't you just wait for seven days? I'm sure the whole problem will be solved." I said, "I told Dr. King that I'm going on Monday, and that's tomorrow—and I'm going."

"I want to go, you know. When I see what's happening to black folks on television, with the news, and the fire hoses, and whatever deal between white folks that's been made, the streets are where I need to be, and where I'm going." And Kennedy said, "Well, I'm sorry you feel that way, Dick, but thanks for returning my call." Next day I got on a plane and flew to Birmingham with Jim Sanders, a brilliant comedy writer. All through the South, he was always with me. He was always arrested with me, but never got his name mentioned in the paper. When we got off the plane and met with King's people, I said that I really had to meet with Martin and tell him about the call I had from the President, because I thought it was serious and that there might be danger when we got to the 16th Street Baptist Church rallying point.

Chapter Five

BIRMINGHAM

by Dick Gregory

When we arrived at the church, I had a strange feeling, seeing the police surrounding the church. I think it went back to my childhood. My mother had told me about the lions eating the Christians and I thought that that period would never recur in history. I thought no one would ever violate the church. But then I saw the way the cops surrounded the church and realized how dangerous it could become to them if it were used as a water trough where people could gather to drink up the ideas of change. The church leaders said, "Until we rid ourselves of certain pressures, we will never find our true spiritual power." We can be happy belonging to an organized religion—it helps us put off the battle, it comforts us. But there's a universal God inside us and there are certain things that the inside of us will not tolerate, even if it means a confrontation to the extent of injury or death.

While I observed the activities in the church, my fear left me. I looked outside the church and what had been hate, and bigotry, and white evilness became fear. I was seeing the same expressions on their faces that I used to see on black folks' faces. They were afraid because officers of the law, knowing what a potential danger one person is, were now dealing with thousands, and, not knowing and not understanding non-violence, saw black folks losing their fear. The power was turning, and the police and their dogs were in trouble.

Those cops who "knew their niggers" suddenly realized that maybe they didn't know them. Cops used to say to black folk, "Get on down the street, boy," and now some black folks said, "Maybe I'm not going on down the street." The Southern cop was forced to do something that he had never done before; to deal with black folks that weren't scared, that couldn't be intimidated. Nobody seemed to mind getting bitten by a dog when there were three thousand people around to help.

A leadership was being developed that was above and beyond mere celebrity; Martin Luther King, the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC), and young people with new, different minds. Black kids listened to the news and gained a new awareness—their conscious mind was no longer locked into getting off the street when they saw white folks coming. Black folks got off the street not necessarily because all white folks wanted them to do that, but they didn't know which ones did and which ones didn't. I was looking out of the church at those cops, waiting to tell Dr. King about the call from the President, when someone said, "We've got a big march ready to leave, and we're trying to hold it, but the kids won't wait. The kids won't wait, and they're ready to go and take the streets downtown."

There were all groups and ages, but most of them were kids. I got arrested with one kid who was four years old. The whole town was under siege. This time, it was not business as usual in the whole town, white or black. Birmingham was the biggest thing happening in the world, on this planet Earth, and everybody was coming in from all over the world to cover it. Jim Sanders and I had to run out of the church to get in front of the group, and no sooner had we stepped off the sidewalk and walked across the street than we were arrested.

We were arrested for parading without a permit, but they didn't tell us at that time what the charge was. They just said, "You're under arrest," and they lined up the paddy wagons, and arrested close to 800 people at that particular affair.

There were so many blacks in the jail, this was the first time most of the niggers in Birmingham were eating good. There was a strong white reaction to the mass jailings; everybody was afraid. "What are we going to do with these blacks in jail? Do we feed them, and what about the whites there?" There was a big debate about whether we were going to get fed. The paper work of arresting so many was mountainous.

A white detective came over to me and said, "Dick Gregory, I'd like to talk to you. This is just a job for me but I really admire what you're doing and I know from what I see here that this whole thing is going to break. I'm one of the people who will be glad, but I have a job, and a wife, and a family, so I guess I'm part of it. I'm going to tell you about your rights, and I have some questions that I want to ask you, and you don't have to answer." I said, "I don't mind answering." "You don't have to. Do you understand your rights?" and he read them to me. "Do you choose to answer these questions?" I said "Yes." I sat down and it almost turned into a comedy. He thought I would be hostile with him after he had pured his whole soul out and that was a heck of a thing for a white cat to do.

He said, "What's your name?" I told him, "You know." "Where do you live?" I told him. He said, "At what time did you get arrested?" I said, "I don't know." He approximated a time. He asked, "What street did you get arrested on?" I said, "I don't know." He stared at me. "What was the name of the church that you came from?" At that time I didn't know, having just gotten to town. I said I didn't know. The detective said, "Well, who were the people you were arrested with?"

I said, "Jim Sanders, who came to town with me." The detective asked, "Where's he from?" "Chicago," I answered. He asked, "Who were the local people?" I said, "I don't know 'em." He began to think I was pulling his leg—he really thought this and he really had an attitude because he said, "Now, wait a minute, I told you you didn't have to answer any questions, and you told me you wanted to." I said, "You really won't believe this, but I don't know anything. I just got off the plane and I haven't been in this town an hour and here I'm in jail now."

We were moved into the cell block, and rumors started that King had been killed and that there were bombings in town. None of this was happening at that time but these were things that people were bringing back to us. There were more rumors from people in jail, and we were worried about being hungry, and then they told us King was arrested. When you're in jail, you're totally out of the mainstream. You can't find out anything for yourself. The jail kept getting more and more crowded. That day I think two thousand people were arrested.

The youngest kid in jail was about four, sucking his thumb. I got to thinking about my kids at home, and I walked over to this little kid, and asked him his name, and he told me, and I asked him what he was in for, and he tried to say "Freedom" but he couldn't; all he could say was "Teedom." He just looked around at the rest of the people in the cells, and everybody ignored him; he stood there by himself, sucking his thumb. He was waiting for his mother to come and get him. I don't even know if his mother knew he was there.

The biggest crowds we had were young people. I was way back in the cell block, and there was a commotion up front. I told Jim Sanders, "I'm going up front to see what's going on."

Somebody was coming into the cell block, and the young kids wouldn't let them close the door. That's when I went up to the front of the cell block, and the jailer was yelling, "You close this door! We'll get this door closed!" He ran out, and I said to the youngsters, "You know we're really not in here to hassle around this door, so we better just close this door." The kids moved back, and I stood next to the door, with my hands around the bars, and forgot that I was in jail. I was at home with the kids and Lillian, and I had drifted out of that jail cell in my mind; meanwhile the jailer had just come back with help to get the cell door closed. I was the only person standing up there and he hit me across the knuckles. I had my hands around the bars, and when he hit me with that night stick, I still didn't realize I was in jail. I opened up the cell door and leaped out on him and spit in his face and balled up my fists and knocked him down and—God, what did I do that for? They ran outside, and came back in with baseball bats, and cue sticks, and just about anything you could think of and I was fighting for my life. I'm sure the only reason I wasn't killed was that the hallway was too narrow and no one could draw back on me, and there were too many cops in there. There were about twenty-five, all shouting and beating me.

The door opened to a small hallway which led to a larger passageway. The kids started pouring out of the open cell door, and then the battle was really on. I was trying to stop the jailers, yelling, "Wait a minute, man!" and they didn't want to hear anything from me. We battled our way all the way into an office outside. Then there was screaming about a jail break, and somehow we ended up fighting back inside. I kept telling the kids to get back in the jail, and we pushed our way back in. I fell unconscious in the hallway and they just pulled me back into the cell.

The jailers were scared to come in. As long as we were back in the cell block, they were happy; they would settle for that. I went to the back of the cell and Jim Sanders said, "Damn, man, they just finished whopping somebody's ass up front," and I said, "That somebody's ass was whopped was mine!" We sat and talked the rest of the night in the cell, dozing on and off. When I woke, my arm was swollen; I had been severely battered. My hand, arm, neck and back were swollen and the kids were really concerned then because they saw how big my arm had gotten and knew the pain I was in.

The rumors started getting out about my beating, and people outside started hearing about it. That morning the federal agents came in from the Justice Department and asked me what had happened. I told them that I had been beaten up in the jail and then they decided to let me out. King had decided to come out. I didn't want to go to the doctor there and I didn't want to talk to the government. I did not want to talk to the agents but I knew I had to talk with someone because of the call from the White House. Then I decided to fly to Chicago and hold a press conference and tell what happened, and how I felt that the White House was not living up to its duty to show that this was not going to be tolerated any more.

At first, no federal troops came in; Kennedy's policy was strictly hands off. Finally, after many arrests, they knew our civil rights had been violated, and the Federal government could get involved. I finally talked to the FBI in Chicago, went back to Birmingham, and stayed a week. There was so much going on; a lot of violence, and a lot of innocent people getting beaten up, and a lot of people losing their jobs.

I saw Martin Luther King at the Gaston Motel, which was bombed, but fortunately he had quietly left the day before. The Gaston Motel was his headquarters. I looked at the police around the motel and questioned the people around me to see if it was safe enough. There were so many bombings, and other violence, that I had a premonition. This was before the 16th Street Baptist Church got blown up, when the four little girls were killed.

Angela Davis went to that church as a little girl. Those were her friends that were killed. Nobody knows that side of the story; they just know Angela Brown, but she's from Birmingham and that was her church and those were her friends that were killed.

I was invited to the home of A. D. King, Martin's brother, in Memphis. His house was also bombed. I was considered a celebrity, and people invited me into their homes because they wanted to know what was going on in the world, how the movement was viewed outside of the South, and what other celebrities would be coming down to help. When I went to A. D.'s house for dinner, there were police sitting outside. Every black leader's home was surrounded by police.

Nothing could happen to A. D. unless the police were involved. They were watching the house. If SCLC headquarters were blown up, officers would be nearby. It was impossible for anyone to do anything without the police knowing about it. There were so many of them around.

The Gaston Motel was the nerve center, for a while, of the Birmingham movement. At the meetings were Fred Shuttlesworth, Ralph Abernathy, Hosea Williams, C. T. Vivian, of course Martin, and a great force, Jim Bevel. Many other people came in and out. I told King at the Gaston that I was worried about the police attitude around the motel. I thought that anytime that motel could go up in smoke, and wondered if there were enough security personnel. Martin said that he felt there was enough security. I didn't feel scared but I felt that the whole motel would go up in smoke and kill everybody in it.

I never understood why the federal government would tolerate the illegal actions of the local and state police. The intimidation of the black population could be seen. In most places, it was the white mob you had to worry about; in Birmingham, it was the police. What would happen to people who live in Birmingham after all this was over with, with that kind of hatred in the police department? What would happen to blacks who had to testify in various trials?

There was no doubt that the problem was going to be resolved. It was costing Birmingham too much money, and costing America too much prestige. Everything changed from that time in Birmingham, the turning point in the civil rights movement. The things that finally got all the black folks involved, were things that shocked black folks—the fire hoses, the dogs, and children being beaten and jailed.

We knew that things would happen to the martyrs, to King and the leadership, but seeing dogs bite children, and fire hoses knocking down little kids—this was more than any normal person could take. It was a reaction against white America, against white, racist America. America had to deal with what would happen to her children. White Americans could easily hate an evil, militant black cat who was making demands on folks, and even some black folks didn't like that; but when it came to hurting children, Birmingham was the turning point in the movement.

Martin asked me to come to Birmingham and the President asked me not to go. The black folks in Birmingham were doing more than they should, and it was time for me to do what I could. So I said, "Yes, Martin, I'll come."

Chapter Six

'PEARLS BEFORE SWINE'

by Mark Lane

On May 10, 1963, it appeared that peace might come to the embattled city of Birmingham, Alabama. The two score bombings that had torn apart the city and set whites and blacks against each other passionately were, it was thought, a remembrance of a troubled and violent recent past. As homes, and churches, and meeting halls owned by blacks had been blown to pieces by dynamite, the anger of the black community began to focus upon the failure of the local and federal police authorities to determine who had planted a single bomb. Arthur Hanes, the Mayor of Birmingham and one of its leading segregationists, had been an FBI agent. Years later testimony revealed that the FBI itself had played a part in the campaign to elect him Mayor. When the bombings began, there was hope that Clarence Kelly, the newly-appointed Special-Agent-In-Charge of the FBI office in Birmingham, would act. However, during the years he occupied that position, not a single bomber was found, not a single case was solved. After Mr. Kelly moved to a new assignment, as Special-Agent-In-Charge of the FBI office in Memphis, Tennessee, his successor in Birmingham was no more effective.

Dr. King and his associates, and the thousands who had witnessed for equality by marching in the streets of Birmingham by kneeling-in in segregated churches, and by demonstrating at its city jail the previous month had won a victory. The walls of apartheid had cracked and Birmingham, previously denounced by Dr. King as "the most thoroughly segregated big city in America" had at last agreed to change.

Dr. King greeted the new moment with a new approach. He said, "The city of Birmingham has reached an accord with its conscience. The acceptance of responsibility by local white and Negro leadership offers an example of a free people uniting to meet and solve their problems." He called upon the black community in Birmingham to "accept this achievement in the right spirit" and to understand that it was not that they had won a narrow victory but rather that a victory had been won "for democracy and the whole citizenry of Birmingham." Dr. King added, "We must respond to every new development in civil rights with an understanding of those who have opposed us, and with an appreciation of the new adjustments that the new achievements pose for them."

The same page of the Birmingham News that carried those conciliatory and healing words also reported that Alabama Senator Lister Hill, urged President John F. Kennedy and Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy to use their "influence and power" to remove Dr. King. Dick Gregory, and other "outside agitators" from Birmingham, charging "that these professional agitators have provoked and led demonstrations and lawlessness in open defiance of state and local laws and court orders."

The Birmingham News that day also carried a headline announcing "All But 119 of Arrested Children Free." The story reported that most of the 1,400 children arrested the previous week in demonstrations had been released on a $300 bond while some children remained in the county jail and others at "emergency quarters at the State Fair Grounds."

Another story on the same page said that "a special report from the Jefferson County Grand Jury commended the Birmingham police department, and Sheriff Mel Bailey and his officers 'for the fine manner in which they have carried out their duties in the difficult situation which has existed here the last several days.' The commendation signed by the grand jury foreman stated 'We feel fortunate in having law enforcement officers of this caliber.'" One column removed from the commendation release was the news story that an FBI investigation was underway into the beating of Dick Gregory in the Birmingham Jail. Clearly all was not well in the city but Dr. King buoyed by the agreement, was hopeful that it signified change.

Reverend Wyatt Tee Walker, the executive director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, was concerned that the new agreement might further anger some segregationists and drive them to acts of violence. When several white men were observed, according to Reverend Walker, "casing the Gaston Motel" late that evening, he reported that activity to the police and asked for police protection. The Birmingham police officials agreed to "keep a watch on the motel."

Later that evening Roosevelt Tatum, a black resident of Birmingham, was in the vicinity of 12th Street and Avenue H. He reported that at approximately 11:30 P.M. he saw a police car slow down and then park on 12th Street directly in front of the residence of Reverend A. D. King.

Tatum said that "a uniformed police officer . . . got out of the car. [and] walked behind the police car to Reverend King's house."

Tatum said that because he was curious about this late night visit by the local police to the home of Martin Luther King's brother, he remained in the shadows silently observing the events that were unfolding before him. The officer, according to Tatum, "walked to the front porch, at a moderate pace, stooped and placed a package at the right side of the steps of Reverend King's house." "ran back to the car and entered it. Then "the driver of the police car tossed something out the window of the auto" and it landed. Tatum said, "approximately two or three feet from the sidewalk directly in front of the King residence." "Almost immediately after the object landed there was an explosion that Tatum said knocked him to the ground. A second explosion took place. Tatum said he stood up, and as he approached the wreckage, saw a police car arrive "as if they were investigating." "The two dynamite bombs had been effective. They demolished a corner of the home, and blew off almost half the roof and the living room wall.

At approximately the same time that dynamite tore apart the residence of A. D. King, the area in the Gaston Motel where his brother, Martin, had been staying was destroyed by another powerful dynamite blast. Two bombs exploded there; one through the registration office wall, directly below Room 30 where Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. had been staying. Three women and a man were injured by this blast at the Gaston Motel. Dr. King had left the motel earlier to return to Atlanta.

According to some observers, Roosevelt Tatum entered into what was left of the King house and helped the children escape through the wreckage. Later Tatum told A. D. King what he had seen immediately before the explosions. A. D. King telephoned the FBI office in Birmingham and two agents reported to Reverend King's house to meet Tatum. They took him to the FBI office and immediately began to question him.

We may never know the presumed target of those Saturday night bombings in Birmingham since it is difficult to enter into the disturbed minds of the bombers and to know what their thinking process may have been. However, to many in the black community of Birmingham, it seemed apparent that attempts had been made to assassinate Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

The agreement for peace had been abrogated and for five hours hundreds of angry blacks filled the streets. It was Saturday night and the bars had been serving for hours a local homemade brew called Joe Lewis, to describe its knockout potential. As the police moved into the streets they were targets of rocks and bricks. A white-owned taxi cab was turned over and set on fire. The police reinforcements arrived with the dreaded police dogs. This time the anger and the resolve of the blacks was so high that the dogs, used to intimidate and assault the demonstrators during the previous weeks, merely provoked more anger and greater resolve. The police almost immediately withdrew the dogs. The response to the possible attempt upon the life of Dr. King was but a precursor on a local level of what was to come to the nation five years later on April 4, 1968. It made, therefore, the response to Dr. King's murder almost predictable. President Kennedy, alarmed by the bombings and by the reaction to them, issued a statement on Sunday in which he said that he was sending Assistant Attorney General Burke Marshall to Birmingham that evening to join with Assistant Deputy Attorney General Joseph Dolan and other Justice Department officials he had sent to Birmingham that morning. He said that he had also instructed Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara "to alert units of the armed forces trained in riot control and to dispatch selected units to military bases in the vicinity of Birmingham."

In addition, President Kennedy nationalized the Alabama National Guard. He explained these emergency actions by stating "I am deeply concerned about the events which occurred in Birmingham, Alabama last night. The home of Reverend A.D. King was bombed and badly damaged. Shortly thereafter, the A.G. Gaston Motel was also bombed. These occurrences led to rioting, personal injury, property damage and various reports of violence and brutality." The response to the bombings by the President and his action in immediately sending high-level Department of Justice officials to the scene, together with the presence of a frightened but determined eyewitness to one of the bombings, gave the leaders of the movement the impression that, at long last, law and order might return to Birmingham.

Martin King returned with plans to lay nonviolent siege to the city. Together with Reverend Fred Shuttlesworth he prepared a bill of rights for Birmingham residents, including equal job opportunities in the large white-owned department stores, a realistic schedule for school desegregation, immediate lunch counter integration, and the appointment of a committee of blacks and whites to discuss the ongoing problems.

Two hundred and fifty blacks sought service at various lunch counters. Sheriff Bull Connor said he would "fill the jail full" and twenty demonstrators were arrested that day. The next day they were sentenced to six months in jail, the maximum provided by the trespassing statute. Other store owners declined to call the police and Bull Connor, powerless to make further arrests, said "We had to let them sit in. It's a disgrace." However, before the week was over more than seventy-five nonviolent demonstrators had been arrested. Some blacks and many white liberals urged Dr. King to leave town and initiate a thirty-day truce. But Martin King, his belief in the white legal structure more tenuous than ever before, pressed on. Easter was approaching and he urged blacks not to purchase new outfits, to boycott the downtown stores, and to attend church on Easter Sunday in blue jeans. He said that he would remain in Birmingham. "The time is always wrong for some people," he said. "The cup of endurance has run over."

The importance of Roosevelt Tatum's statement was not lost upon the federal authorities in Washington. As the Klan rallied in Birmingham and as Dr. King proclaimed that the time would never be more right for a commitment to nonviolent action, Tatum was taken to the office of an Assistant Attorney General in Washington and questioned at length. He said that for three days beginning on Tuesday, May 14 he was interrogated by Justice Department employees and two men he could describe only as "Washington lawyers." He also said that a member of Congress from New York was present during part of the questioning.

Upon his return Tatum was questioned by FBI agents in the Birmingham office and subjected to polygraph examination. He later reported upon what he considered to be the odd conduct of the agents who had administered the "lie detector" test. They had, he said, told him to answer each question negatively so that they could get a proper reading when he did not tell the truth. Because the questions he was asked did not pertain to the events that he observed on the evening of May 11, he said he was not suspicious at the time. He was told, he recalled later, to answer "no" to all questions about his "family life" and "the names of his children." He said he did so, and when the polygraph examination was completed the agents required him to sign a statement admitting that he had made false statements. He said he was told that if he did not do so he would be prosecuted. He signed the statement.

Tatum had been employed at the Choctaw Pipe Company. His closest friend was his roommate and fellow worker at the pipe company, Morris Teasley. Teasley offered a form of corroboration for many of Tatum's observations. On May 12, Tatum told him that he had seen the police officers place and throw the dynamite at the King house. Teasley recalled that Tatum told him how he had been tricked into making false statements during the polygraph examination. One example Teasley recalled was that Tatum said that he was told by the agent, "When we ask you if you have a child named 'Bronco' you say no." When Tatum was asked that question he told Teasley that he answered "no" and then the agent said that he could send him to jail for lying. Teasley observed, "they tricked him on that. But why? But why?"

On June 27, a federal grand jury was drawn in Birmingham for the United States District Court for the Northern District of Alabama. The drawing had been scheduled for July and the premature move was marked by another departure from custom. A deputy marshal is traditionally assigned to conduct that routine task. On this occasion the U.S. Marshal, Peyton Norville, selected the names of the jurors himself in the court of U.S. District Court Judge Clarence Allgood. Later in a conversation with Chief Deputy U.S. Marshal Daniel Moore, Norville said "Well, I have put my son-in-law on the grand jury." According to Moore, Norville explained to him that he had just "written in his name at the bottom of the list. I didn't select it. I just wrote in it."

In a subsequent investigation into a peripheral matter (an effort to remove Chief Deputy Moore for "speaking out too freely, particularly with regard to the illegal manipulation of the grand jury") a Department of Justice report to the Administrative Assistant Attorney General confirmed the charge that "the then Marshal, Mr. Norville, knowing his son-in-law to be a qualified voter, wrote his name on a piece of paper and put it into the box."

Moore later said that he believed that the grand jury had been organized improperly for one reason. "It was," he told me, "to get Tatum. To indict him. He was a problem. They had to get him out of the way."

On July 26, 1963, Macon Weaver, the United States Attorney with jurisdiction in Birmingham wrote to the Department of Justice "requesting authority to prosecute one Roosevelt Tatum 'for making false statements to the FBI.'" Upon receipt of that request Assistant Attorney General Herbert J. Miller, Jr., responded for the Department of Justice. He wrote that the Department had concluded that "this is not an appropriate vehicle for prosecution" and advised against the prosecution of Roosevelt Tatum as recommended by the local federal authorities under Title 18, Section 1001.

The grand jury convened in Birmingham, nevertheless, and indicted Roosevelt Tatum. The minutes remain secret but an attorney, Orzell Billingsley, who represented Tatum was permitted to read them a decade ago and make contemporaneous notes. The notes reveal that among the witnesses to appear before the grand jury was James Edward Lay, a Civil Defense Captain who said that "the Negro population of the City of Birmingham is under my supervision," and testified that "it is not the prevailing view by Negroes that the bombing was done by police officers."

A police officer who drove a police car apparently testified that he was at the scene "before the second explosion" and that he did not normally patrol the area involved.

The first FBI agent to testify said that Tatum had told him of his observations on May 11, the night of the bombing. The same agent was later recalled to state that he talked with Tatum on July 3.

Another witness testified that he lived near A.D. King's house and that he did see a police car parked in front of that house. He said he saw only one officer in the car at the time.

Another local FBI agent testified about his "investigation of Negroes" and about "their resentment."

The FBI polygraph examiner, brought in from his assignment in Memphis, testified that he did ask a series of routine questions of Tatum "about his family" and "other routine things" and that he did talk with Tatum "for about one hour before the examination was given."

It appeared that substantial portions of Tatum's statement had received some corroboration even by hostile witnesses before a hostile grand jury. A police car was in the area, although not ordinarily assigned to patrol that area. It was parked in front of the King residence and when it was observed by one witness at that time there was only one occupant in it. Tatum was talked to at length before the polygraph examination was given and was asked routine questions about his family at the outset of the examination. Together with the direction from the Department of Justice not to prosecute, the improper selection of the grand jury, and the inflammatory and irrelevant information submitted to the grand jury, it seemed very unlikely that Tatum could be indicted.

On August 20 the home of Arthur Shores was bombed in Birmingham. Shores, a black lawyer, had represented two black students who had enrolled earlier that summer at the University of Alabama. Following that bombing the U.S. Attorney Macon Weaver issued a public statement. The federal authorities in Birmingham had until that time been unable to solve a single bombing. Now Weaver felt that he had at last located a certifiable culprit. The Birmingham News carried a front-page story under the headlines "False Charges Brought Attack On Police." The story reads:

U.S. Atty. Macon L. Weaver, in an unprecedented disclosure of Justice Department secrets, today said "false charges" that two policemen bombed a Negro minister's home in May resulted directly in the violent aftermath of Tuesday night's bombing of Negro Attorney Arthur Shore's home.

After a fourteen-paragraph story which condemned Tatum, the U.S. Attorney referred at last to the bombing of the Shores home. He said "The FBI is working, as always, closely with the local police department to bring to the bar of justice the perpetrators of this crime against society."

The following day in a front-page story under the headline "Jury to Probe Negro's Life" Judge Allgood said, according to the Birmingham News, "he will ask a federal grand jury to consider charges against a Negro who falsely alleged that Birmingham police bombed a Negro minister's home last May." If the newspaper report is accurate the good judge had evidently determined and publicly reported that Tatum had "falsely" implicated the police even before he was indicted.

The following week Roosevelt Tatum was indicted by the federal grand jury in Birmingham under Title 18, Section 1001, for making a false statement to the FBI. In the minds of the Birmingham black community, the connection between the local police, the U.S. Attorney's Office, the FBI, and the federal judiciary was never more clearly established. In the past there was the hope that the federal authorities might act as a restraining force against local police excesses but the indictment of Roosevelt Tatum shattered such hopes, particularly since it so closely followed President Kennedy's decision to send his Justice Department representatives to Birmingham. A presidential election was approaching; the black community, isolated and alone, had reason to feel alienated from the white system of justice.

Surely other witnesses would be afraid to come forward no matter what they saw. The government had indicated the one person who had come forward and said he was witness to a bombing. Upon reflection Orzell Billingsley said; "Why, no witness would dare open his mouth after they got Roosevelt for telling the truth. You'd have to be crazy to. They could do anything they wanted, bomb in broad daylight with a crowd watching and people would be too scared to say who did it. Man, to make a truthful statement to the FBI after that was like casting pearls before swine."

Approximately two weeks later the Sunday school at the 16th Street Baptist Church was blown up by dynamite. Four little black girls, Denise McNair, eleven year old, and Cynthia Wesley, Carol Robertson, and Addie Mae Collins, all fourteen years old, were killed.

President Kennedy sent Burke Marshall back to Birmingham and a special force of fifteen FBI agents was on the scene. The Justice Department said it would undertake the most vigorous manhunt since John Dillinger was captured.

Martin King delivered a moving epitaph. He said the four children "have something to say to each of us in their death, to every minister of the gospel who had remained silent behind the safe security of stained glass windows, to every politician who has fed his constituents with the stale bread of hatred and the spoiled meat of racism." He added "we must be concerned not merely about who murdered them but about the system, the way of life, the philosophy which produced the murderers."

Roosevelt Tatum's case was to be tried in the continuing hysteria that was Birmingham before an all-white jury under the direction of Judge Allgood. His lawyer, Orzell Billingsley, had undertaken to handle the defense of some 3,000 persons who had been arrested in the previous weeks, a trial load so awesome that no lawyer could have adequately performed if he had been given ten years to do so.

He began by challenging the grand jury which returned the indictment against Tatum, charging quite accurately that blacks had been denied service on that panel. Billingsley was convinced then that Tatum was innocent and, now in retrospect, he remains even more convinced that Tatum had told the truth and had been tricked. The record reveals that Tatum appeared in Judge Allgood's court on the morning of November 18, 1963. His lawyer was excused so that he could try another case that morning with the understanding that he would return to try the Tatum case at 2 o'clock that afternoon. Yet the afternoon session began with Billingsley entering the plea of guilty while Tatum stood silently by.

The lawyer was not present on the day of sentence and Roosevelt Tatum, standing alone, was sentenced by Judge Allgood to a penitentiary for one year and one day.

Today the lawyer cannot recall why Tatum, who insisted that he was innocent even on the day that the guilty plea was entered, pleaded guilty. He does recall the oppressive atmosphere, the hopelessness, and the isolation that marked those bitter days. He believes that the system coerced the plea.

The federal and local police record remains intact. It is impossible to determine with certainty whether or not Tatum was a reliable witness. Nevertheless, the chilling fact remains that the only person convicted in connection with a Birmingham bombing was a man who came forward as a witness, Roosevelt Tatum. If his plea was not freely entered into, but was a result of the hopelessness of the situation, then this attempt to murder Dr. King bears, in its legal conclusion, a remarkable similarity to the legal conclusion of the case against James Earl Ray, the man who allegedly did kill him.

Toward the end of 1964 Roosevelt Tatum was released from prison. He left Birmingham, where he could not find a job, to look for work in New York City. Before leaving his friends and his family he said that he had told the truth about the bombing of A. D. King's house. His friends say that he insisted that he would keep on telling the truth, whatever the cost.

He died in 1970, at the age of 46.

Chapter Seven

BIRMINGHAM JAIL

by Dick Gregory

Birmingham demonstrated how thoroughly American society was insulated against realizing what it had become. Birmingham forced America to face some terrible truths about itself. The world joined hands in outrage when television cameras recorded the grim pictures of children being clubbed and waterhosed, and dogs turned loose on nonviolent marchers. That's why the Lassie TV show got more hate mail from the ghetto than anyplace else.

At the same time, Birmingham was the wedge; it offered the opportunity for King and his followers to prove how powerful nonviolence was. And, it made America recognize itself, the mightiest nation on earth, as a country whose practices were inconsistent with its creed. It exposed America as grossly hypocritical, woefully insensitive to the needs and plight of its minorities, its poor, and its old.

Countless numbers of us went to jail in Birmingham. I never did worry about staying in jail too long back in the 1960s because in those days I was earning more than a million dollars a year. So I knew the Internal Revenue was going to see to it that I didn't stay in jail too long. I remember the crowded jail cells and the inhumane treatment that was, for some of us, an introduction to Southern hospitality. Surprise lit the faces of the authorities when they realized how many we were and how unconditionally committed we were to going to jail and even dying, if necessary, to prove our utter dedication to the philosophy of nonviolence.

It was from such an inhospitable cell that King wrote his classic open letter to the clergy, entitled simply "Letter From Birmingham Jail." This letter was a response to eight white clergymen who wrote a public statement criticizing King for what they termed "unwise and untimely" demonstrations. In the reply, addressed to "My Dear Fellow Clergymen," King cleanly excised the meat, the nitty-gritty of the principles of Judaism, Christianity, and nonviolence and proved them interchangeable.

Moving away from the American establishment as a target of criticism, King, here for the first time, dealt with the flaws and shortcomings of the church in America.

King said the church could do no more than reflect America, and that America, in turn, reflected the church. He saw the church as the moral barometer of the nation. He felt that religious institutions must be dedicated to humanity, equality, and justice; that this dedication was prerequisite to the development of a society in which all men and women could develop their highest potential.

I share with King the idea that America can be no worse than its churches. I would like to see American religious institutions become so clean and pure and just, that the country could pattern after them, thus becoming all that it has ever claimed, striven and hoped to be.

But we must let King's words of April 1963, speak for his position.

MY DEAR FELLOW CLERGYMEN:

. . . But more basically, I am in Birmingham because injustice is here. Just as the prophets of the eighth century B. C. left their villages and carried their "thus saith the Lord" far beyond the boundaries of their home towns, and just as the Apostle Paul left his village of Tarsus and carried the gospel of Jesus Christ to the far corners of the Greco-Roman world, so am I compelled to carry the gospel of freedom beyond my own home town. Like Paul, I must constantly respond to the Macedonian call for aid. . . .

. . . Perhaps it is easy for those who have never felt the stinging darts of segregation to say, "Wait." . . . But when you have seen vicious mobs lynch your mothers and fathers at will and drown your sisters and brothers at whim; when you have seen hate-filled policemen curse, kick, and even kill your black brothers and sisters; when you see the vast majority of your twenty million Negro brothers smothering in an airtight cage of poverty in the midst of an affluent society; when you suddenly find your tongue twisted and your speech stammering as you seek to explain to your six-year-old daughter why she can't go to the public amusement park that has just been advertised on television, and see tears welling up in her eyes when she is told that Funtown is closed to colored children, and see ominous clouds of inferiority beginning to form in her little mental sky, and see her beginning to distort her personality by developing an unconscious bitterness toward white people; when you have to concoct an answer for a five-year-old son who is asking, "Daddy, why do white people treat colored people so mean?"; when your first name becomes "nigger," your middle name becomes "boy" (however old you are) and your last name becomes "John," and your wife and mother are never given the respected title "Mrs.," when you are harried by day and haunted by night by the fact that you are a Negro, living constantly at tiptoe stance, never quite knowing what to expect next, and are plagued with inner fears and outer resentments; when you are forever fighting a degenerating sense of "nobodiness"—then you will understand why we find it difficult to wait. There comes a time when the cup of endurance runs over, and men are no longer willing to be plunged into the abyss of despair, I hope, sirs, you can understand our legitimate and unavoidable impatience. . . .

. . . So the question is not whether we will be extremists, but what kind of extremists we will be. Will we be extremists for hate or for love? Will we be extremists for the preservation of injustice or for the extension of justice? In that dramatic scene on Calvary's hill three men were crucified. We must never forget that all three were crucified for the same crime—the crime of extremism. Two were extremists for immorality, and thus fell below their environment. The other, Jesus Christ, was an extremist for love, truth, and goodness, and thereby rose above his environment. Perhaps the South, the nation, and the world are in dire need of creative extremists.

. . . Let us all hope that the dark clouds of racial prejudice will soon pass away and the deep fog of misunderstanding will be lifted from our fear-drenched communities, and in some not too distant tomorrow the radiant stars of love and brotherhood will shine over our great nation with all their scintillating beauty.

Yours for the cause of peace and brotherhood.
MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

Chapter Eight

'I HAVE A DREAM'

by Dick Gregory

The March on Washington on August 28, 1963, was a drama of epic proportions. I will never forget it. It was wall-to-wall black folks and white folks over a quarter of a million of us; I had never seen so many black folks and white folks together this side of a race riot. No event in human history was so feverishly anticipated, so fervently hoped for before it became reality. None has been so thoroughly analyzed, dissected and dissected when it was over. We made our point to the world—that the civil rights of black Americans must be respected.

It is not difficult to extract from the great panorama of the day the single most awesome, most inspiring, most moving aspect. What has come to be known as King's "I Have a Dream" speech was easily the gem that sparkled most brightly.

Those who were not present and have had to rely on published versions of the speech, however textually accurate, will never know the precise flavor. King's mood, the exhilaration he exuded are elements that cannot be reproduced on the printed page.

It seemed as if the very cells of his body were charged with new life and renewed spirit. As if the magic of the day, the nobility of the cause had been transformed into a potent elixir and absorbed into the very cells of his body, infusing him with optimism, courage, and joy. It was contagious. All of us there, black, white, young, old, rich, poor, Jew, Gentile, and Muslim caught King's spirit. Spontaneously, it was as if we all knew that after today we would never be the same, that whatever lay ahead: suffering, uncertainty, doubt, fear—even death—nothing would ever turn us around. We found a vigor, a lightness of heart, a gladness of soul that we had not brought with us, but which, miraculously, we were all privileged to take away.

Opponents of the March and its goals hoped for violence. We disappointed them. It was a picnic. I remember the March On Washington mainly because it was the only march I participated in that I wasn't arrested. As a matter of fact, the March On Washington set a record for an American city. It was the first time that a civil rights march was held that the police arrested more criminals that day than civil rights marchers. It was a day of jubilee.

I can see Martin now, walking to the podium, amidst thunderous applause, waiting patiently until it was over, and then, with simplicity, honesty and human warmth say:

Five score years ago, a great American, in whose symbolic shadow we stand today, signed the Emancipation Proclamation. This momentous decree came as a great beacon of light and of hope to millions of Negro slaves who had been seared in the flames of withering injustice. It came as a joyous daybreak to end the long night of their captivity.

But one hundred years later, the Negro still is not free. One hundred years later, the life of the Negro is still sadly crippled by the manacles of segregation and the chains of discrimination.

One hundred years later, the Negro lives on a lonely island of poverty in the midst of a vast ocean of material prosperity. One hundred years later, the Negro is still languishing in the corners of American society and finds himself an exile in his own land. So we have come here today to dramatize a shameful condition.

In a sense, we have come to our nation's capital to cash a check. When the architects of our republic wrote the magnificent words of the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, they were signing a promissory note to which every American was to fall heir. This note was a promise that all men, yes, black men as well as white men, would be granted the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

It is obvious today that America has defaulted on this promissory note insofar as her citizens of color are concerned. Instead of honoring this sacred obligation, America has given the Negro people a bad check, which has come back marked "insufficient funds."

But we refuse to believe that the bank of justice is bankrupt. We refuse to believe that there are insufficient funds in the great vaults of opportunity of this nation. So we have come to cash this check—a check that will give us upon demand the riches of freedom and the security of justice.

We have also come to this hallowed spot to remind America of the fierce urgency of now. This is no time to engage in the luxury of cooling off or to take the tranquilizing drug of gradualism.

Now is the time to make real the promises of democracy. Now is the time to rise from the dark and desolate valleys of segregation to the sunlit path of racial justice. Now is the time to lift our nation from the quicksands of racial injustice to the solid rock of brotherhood. Now is the time to make justice a reality for all of God's children.

It would be fatal for the nation to overlook the urgency of the movement and to underestimate the determination of the Negro. This sweltering summer of the Negro's legitimate discontent will not pass until there is an invigorating autumn of freedom and equality. Nineteen sixty-three is not an end but a beginning. Those who hope that the Negro needed to blow off steam and will now be content will have a rude awakening if the nation returns to business as usual.

There will be neither rest nor tranquility in America until the Negro is granted his citizenship rights. The whirlwinds of revolt will continue to shake the foundations of our nation until the bright day of justice emerges.

But there is something that I must say to my people who stand on the warm threshold which leads into the palace of justice. In the process of gaining our rightful place, we must not be guilty of wrongful deeds.

Let us not seek to satisfy our thirst for freedom by drinking from the cup of bitterness and hatred. We must forever conduct our struggle on the high plane of dignity and discipline. We must not allow our creative protest to degenerate into physical violence. Again and again we must rise to the majestic heights of meeting physical force with soul force.

The marvelous new militancy which has engulfed the Negro community must not lead us to a distrust of all white people, for many of our white brothers, as evidenced by their presence here today, have come to realize that their destiny is tied up with our destiny, and they have come to realize that their freedom is inextricably bound to our freedom. This offense we share mounted to storm the battlements of injustice must be carried forth by a biracial army. We cannot walk alone.

And as we walk, we must make the pledge that we shall always march ahead. We cannot turn back. There are those who are asking the devotees of civil rights, "When will you be satisfied?" We can never be satisfied as long as the Negro is the victim of the unspeakable horrors of police brutality.

We can never be satisfied as long as our bodies, heavy with the fatigue of travel, cannot gain lodging in the motels of the highways and the hotels of the cities. We cannot be satisfied as long as the Negro's basic mobility is from a smaller ghetto to a larger one.

We can never be satisfied as long as our children are stripped of their selfhood and robbed of their dignity by signs stating "for whites only." We cannot be satisfied as long as a Negro in Mississippi cannot vote, and a Negro in New York believes he has nothing for which to vote. No, we are not satisfied, and we will not be satisfied until justice rolls down like water and righteousness like a mighty stream.

I am not unmindful that some of you have come here out of excessive trials and tribulation. Some of you have come from narrow jail cells. Some of you have come from areas where your quest for freedom left you battered by the storms of persecution and staggered by the winds of police brutality. You have been the veterans of creative suffering. Continue to work with the faith that unearned suffering is redemptive.

Go back to Mississippi; go back to Alabama; go back to South Carolina; go back to Georgia; go back to Louisiana; go back to the slums and ghettos of the northern cities, knowing that somehow this situation can and will be changed. Let us not wallow in the valley of despair.

So I say to you, my friends, that even though we must face the difficulties of today and tomorrow, I still have a dream. It is a dream deeply rooted in the American dream that one day this nation will rise up and live out the true meaning of its creed—"we hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal."

I have a dream that one day on the red hills of Georgia, sons of former slaves and sons of former slave owners will be able to sit down together at the table of brotherhood.

I have a dream that one day even the State of Mississippi, a state sweltering with the heat of injustice, sweltering with the heat of oppression, will be transformed into an oasis of freedom and justice.

I have a dream my four little children will one day live in a nation where they will not be judged by the color of their skin but by the content of their character. I have a dream today!

I have a dream that one day, down in Alabama, with its vicious racists, with its governor's lips dripping with the words of interposition and nullification, that one day, right there in Alabama, little black boys and black girls will be able to join hands with little white boys and white girls as sisters and brothers. I have a dream today!

I have a dream that one day every valley shall be exalted, every hill and mountain shall be made low, the rough places shall be made plain, and the crooked places shall be made straight, and the glory of the Lord will be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together.

This is our hope. This is the faith that I go back to the South with.

With this faith we will be able to hew out of the mountain of despair a stone of hope. With this faith we will be able to transform the jangling discords of our nation into a beautiful symphony of brotherhood.

With this faith we will be able to work together, to pray together, to struggle together, to go to jail together, to stand up for freedom together, knowing that we will be free one day. This will be the day when all of God's children will be able to sing with new meaning—"My country 'tis of thee; sweet land of liberty; of thee I sing; land where my fathers died, land of the pilgrim's pride; from every mountainside, let freedom ring"—and if America is to be a great nation, this must become true.

So let freedom ring from the prodigious hilltops of New Hampshire.

Let freedom ring from the mighty mountains of New York.

Let freedom ring from the heightening Alleghenies of Pennsylvania.

Let freedom ring from the snowcapped Rockies of Colorado.

Let freedom ring from the curvaceous slopes of California.

But not only that.

Let freedom ring from Stone Mountain of Georgia.

Let freedom ring from Lookout Mountain of Tennessee.

Let freedom ring from every hill and molehill of Mississippi—from every mountainside, let freedom ring.

And when we allow freedom to ring, when we let it ring from every village and hamlet, from every state and city, we will be able to speed up that day when all of God's children—black men and white men, Jews and Gentiles, Catholics and Protestants—will be able to join hands and to sing in the words of the old Negro spiritual: "Free at last, free at last; thank God Almighty, we are free at last."

Chapter Nine

“A FAR DEEPER MALADY”

by Mark Lane

Dr. King had become the most prestigious leader for liberation in recent American history. Future historians would in all probability consider this Southern black preacher, the son of a Southern black preacher, along with Abraham Lincoln. While others devised the “black is beautiful” slogan, a phrase which Dr. King admired little, in the ghettos of Montgomery and Birmingham and Selma and Jackson and Atlanta and Chicago, poor blacks looked toward Dr. King and said he was proof that they were not inferior. They said he had proved as well that they were not born to be victims; that by working together they had the power to control their own destiny, to shape their own lives.

In the spring of 1967, Dr. King risked all that he had achieved, his national reputation, a working relationship with the American news media, with black leaders and other national leaders, and the financial security of his Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC). On that day he committed the SCLC to a formally sealed compact which unanimously condemned the war in Vietnam as “politically and morally unjust” and pledging to do “everything in our power” to end it.

A few days later, on April 4, 1967, Dr. King called upon all blacks and “all white people of good will” to boycott the war by becoming conscientious objectors to military service. He outlined a program designed to “begin the long and difficult process of extracting ourselves from this nightmarish conflict.” He likened the use of new weapons against the farmers of Vietnam to the testing of “new tortures in the concentration camps of Europe” by the Nazis. Dr. King bitterly assailed American military policy from the standpoint of the Vietnamese peasants who watch as we poison their water, as we kill a million acres of their crops.

They must weep as the bulldozers roar through their area preparing to destroy the precious trees. They wander into the hospitals, with at least twenty casualties from American firepower for one Vietcong-inflicted injury.

So far, we may have killed a million of them—mostly children. They wander into the towns and see thousands of the children, homeless, without clothes, running in packs on the streets like animals. They see the children degraded by our soldiers as they beg for food. They see the children selling their sisters to our soldiers, soliciting for their mothers.

Dr. King added, “If America’s soul becomes totally poisoned, part of the autopsy must read Vietnam.”

One year later to the day, he was dead.

Dr. King’s call for action to end the war was greeted with a chorus of public denunciation created by many of the nationally known leaders, including black opinion makers.

In an article published in Reader’s Digest, a nationally known black communicator charged that Dr. King had created “doubt about the Negro’s loyalty to his country.” He had become “persona non grata to Lyndon Johnson,” and he added that King’s former friends in Congress will probably not be “moved by him the way they were in the past.”

He then wrote that “talk of Communists influencing the actions and words of the young minister” had been revived. He added, “I report this not to endorse what King and many others will consider a ‘guilt by association’ smear, but because of the threat that these allegations represent to the civil rights movement.” He wrote that since Dr. King had involved himself in “a conflict where the United States is in direct combat with Communism,” he had imperiled chances for needed legislation to protect civil rights workers in the South and to ban housing discrimination.

The executive director of a national black organization agreed. He said that “urgent domestic programs of civil rights and the issue of the war in Vietnam should remain separate.” The Jewish War Veterans (JWV) sharply attacked King. In reference to his comparison between German and American methods, the JWV charged, “It is utterly incredible that Dr. King’s denunciation of our government should manifest itself in such an ugly parallel.”

Another national black organization reported that its board of the directors had voted unanimously against the proposal by Dr. King to “merge the civil rights and peace movements.” The board called Dr. King’s efforts “a serious tactical mistake” and added, “we are not a peace organization.”

Senator Jacob Javits, a leading Republican liberal, said King's statement is "certainly bound to be resented by the country which is deeply involved in the war and which feels it can certainly do justice by the Negro at one and the same time."

Lyndon Johnson told a cabinet member, "That goddamn nigger preacher may drive me out of the White House." While Dr. King never evidenced such a desire, his call for peace, begun that day in early April and continued through the last year of his life, may have played an important part in President Johnson's decision not to seek reelection. It was the war and the growing opposition to it that led to Johnson's somewhat involuntary retirement.

What the President said with characteristic bluntness in private, the leading news media put more acceptably and more publicly.

Dr. King's last year on earth began in turmoil. He appeared to stand almost alone as a withering torrent of apparently orchestrated abuse engulfed him. He had expected that his public dissent from the war would create controversy. He had been advised that donations to the SCLC might sharply diminish and that public figures, major newspapers, and even some black leaders would express their displeasure. He was, nevertheless, unprepared for the depth of hostility he witnessed.

He was almost bewildered and thoroughly frustrated by the unthinking response to his call for an end to the war. He had reason to be frightened. For he appeared to stand almost alone, and to those who detested him, he appeared more helpless and vulnerable than ever before. Yet if he was frightened by the savage nature of the attacks, he never expressed that fear privately, and publicly his initial opposition to the war was honed through his almost prophetic reasoning into an analysis of the nature of American imperialism.

At that moment, and for the days that were left to him, his thoughtful bravery and his grace while under fire were never more apparent. Those who hid behind their shield of Congressional immunity, protected by a biased media and supported in their endeavors by the awesome power of the intelligence organizations, called into question his manhood and challenged his courage. Yet he was not blinded by panic. In private he wept as the reckless attacks against him increased. Yet through the tears of frustration, no doubt swollen by self-pity and righteous indignation, he saw the problem more clearly. He understood the goals of those who opposed him and took the full measure of their power.

And then he spoke. In 1967, a few months before he was murdered, he said:

The war in Vietnam is just a symptom of a far deeper malady within the American spirit. And if we ignore this sobering reality, we will find ourselves organizing clergy and layman concerned committees for the next generation. They will be concerned with Guatemala and Peru; they will be concerned about Thailand and Cambodia; they will be concerned about Mozambique and South Africa. We will be marching for these and a dozen other names and attending rallies without end unless there is a significant and profound change in American life and politics.

Dr. King had been to the mountain top. And from the panoramic perception afforded by the lofty height, he set aside personal concerns for self and shared his view with those who could still hear him through the mounting din of false analysis.

He was a dangerous man. He had perceived some dangerous truths and he was so struck by the meaning of his discoveries that he incautiously, almost recklessly, spoke to us of what he had learned.

His words almost a decade ago spoke to the developing efforts for national liberation in Southeast Asia, in Latin America, and in Africa. If we need not march off to rallies to protest American involvement there, then some small credit must be given to his words and his actions.

Newsweek reported in its news columns that Dr. King's opposition to the war was brought about because "he saw black students defecting to [Stokely] Carmichael and white liberals, increasingly deserting civil rights causes for peace parades." Newsweek continued, "He considered his role as a Nobel peace laureate, a clergyman, even a prophet." Emmet John Hughes, writing in Newsweek, said, under a heading "A Curse of Confusion" and a sub-heading "False Image," King "achieves perhaps the greatest irony in his fancy that the civil rights movement can be strengthened by enlisting the moral passions exacted by Vietnam. . . . He propagates, even more remarkably, a confusion of moral and political values."

_____ offered another motive for Dr. King's opposition to the war.

Some say it was a matter of ego—that he was convinced that since was the most influential Negro in the United States, President Johnson would have to listen to him and alter U.S. policy in Vietnam.

Perhaps Reverend Bernard Lee of Atlanta, Dr. King's close friend and aide, had better reason than most to understand why King had spoken out against the war. The Reverend Lee recently recalled that day in the Spring of 1967. "Martin and I were traveling to Jamaica. He was going to finish a book that he had been working on. Martin always carried a couple of really heavy suitcases. Never had any clothes in them, really. They were filled with books and magazines and various kinds of documents that he would study.

The Reverend Lee said that before boarding the plane they stopped at a restaurant. Both ordered dinner. Dr. King had stopped off at a newsstand to pick up an armload of current magazines. The food arrived and both men began to eat. While he ate Dr. King looked through the magazines. The Reverend Lee said, "When he came to Ramparts magazine he stopped. He froze as he looked at the pictures from Vietnam. He saw a picture of a Vietnamese mother holding her dead baby, a baby killed by our military. Then Martin just pushed the plate of food away from him. I looked up and said, 'Doesn't it taste any good?' and he answered, 'Nothing will ever taste any good for me until I do everything I can to end that war.'

"That's when the decision was made. Martin had known about the war before then, of course, and had spoken out against it. But it was then that he decided to commit himself to oppose it. When we got back from Jamaica that is what he did."

When he returned to the United States, Dr. King embarked upon a militant program designed to gain political and economic rights for blacks. He continued and increased the marching and organizing in Chicago, announced a twenty-city boycott campaign against companies with discriminatory hiring policies and began to mobilize white college students for work in political education campaigns.

Dr. King said that the war was morally wrong and itself a barrier to the realization of the dreams of black people. "Many of the very programs we are talking about," he said, "have been stifled because of that war in Vietnam. I am absolutely convinced that the frustrations are going to increase in the ghettos of our nation as long as the war continues."

Dr. King pointed out that blacks were serving in Vietnam in disproportionate numbers. Twice as many blacks as whites died each day in Vietnam in relationship to their numbers in the whole population.

He answered those who insisted that he should work only in the civil rights movement with but two sentences.

He said he opposed segregation and that he would refuse to separate his principles. He said the war was wrong and that he would oppose it until it ended.

Chapter Ten

THE LAST CAMPAIGN

by Dick Gregory

Martin Luther King had become the true voice of America. When you read the United States Constitution, you hear all the beautiful things we teach in our grade schools, and our high schools; and colleges of what America should be all about. Martin brought those dead words alive. America needed a voice; America needed millions to speak out and yell; America needed to be heard the world over, and it was—through Martin's commitment. Through his suffering and unselfish attitude when it came to helping others, Martin earned the right to be that voice. Not just to be the spokesperson for black America, but he spoke for what the true, real, America should have been speaking about and sounding like. Because of that, every section of the country and the world that was having problems and was reaching out and crying for help was reaching for Martin. Come Martin, help us Martin, be with us Martin, lead with us. If you were here we could survive. Yes, we could survive. Oh God, if we could just get Martin here it would be all over. The white folks would listen to him. If we could get Martin here we could raise enough money. If we could get Martin here he would say it like it's supposed to be said. Martin Luther King developed into the real, true, honest voice of America. Because of him, every town, village, and city in America where there was suffering going on called on King for help. It wasn't just black folks who needed him. The Jews, the Gentiles, the Catholics, the Irish, the Baptists, the old and the young, men and women; they were all calling for Martin. Come and help us, talk to us, give us some encouragement. Tell us what we would not accept anyone else telling us. Tell us Martin, tell us rich, white, sophisticated folks what this America is all about. Because he was the voice for an entire nation, King was always in demand. As important as Memphis was, it came at a bad time.

The need for King to return to Memphis in April 1968 to help the striking garbage workers came at an inconvenient time. Martin Luther King was getting ready to do something that neither he nor any other civil rights leader had tried to do before. He was preparing for the Poor People's Campaign and March on Washington. Never before had masses of poor folks come together and talked about being poor and disadvantaged. This was different from all the other marches and demonstrations that Martin Luther King had led. Organizing a one-day march was simple. King had proven to America and the world that large numbers of black people could be organized for short periods of time. Many of the people participating in King's previous marches were not the poor and the hungry, but mainly middle class people, celebrities, and working folks. This was going to be different. This time the force would come from a different group of people. The ones without jobs, people without enough food to feed their families, and the people whose faith in the American system had been shattered because of years of discrimination and injustice. The Poor People's March on Washington would go down in history as the biggest demonstration that the nation's capital had ever been confronted with—and it would be nonviolent. Imagine Dr. King coming into Washington, D. C. with thousands of poor people of all colors, quietly asking America for a chance to be part of that respected segment of society reserved for the chosen few.

King knew that the Poor People's March would need a lot of careful planning. Everything had to be just right or it would not work. All things had to be considered. A lot of money would be needed, and King himself would be influential in raising funds. People might be reluctant to contribute to a cause that seemed as farfetched as thousands of poor folks marching into the nation's capital. King would have to convince both blacks and whites that it would work. And even if the money were raised, there were so many other problems that would have to be considered with so many people living in such close contact for an undetermined length of time. Husbands and wives would be together. Some pregnant women would come to Washington and give birth while they were there. Others might become pregnant, and there would be the problem of having the proper medical care available for them. There would be sickness, and problems of taking care of young children. Everyone would have to be fed properly, and while all these necessary things had to be taken into account, King still had the burden of watching out for government agents provocateurs. They might try to undo all the hard work and effort that had gone into the planning of this demonstration. King knew that he had a big job waiting ahead of him, and he was hoping everything would work out. He knew that if the Poor People's March was a success, black people and poor folks of all colors would be on their way to a better life.

The two things that upset the Establishment most about Martin Luther King were the fact that he came out against the war in Vietnam, and his plan for a Poor People's March in the nation's capital. King's plan to bring thousands of people into Washington, D. C. would broaden his base from civil rights to human rights. He would not only be concerned with equality under the law for blacks, but for all citizens who were not getting a chance to earn their fair share of what America had to offer. They would demand jobs and decent wages. This would be a new era in American history.

Many whites have always had a basic fear of black people, and that fear alone makes them resist anything that even appears as though it might have an effect on them. If Martin Luther King's bringing poor folks to the capital was going to jeopardize their jobs, or their life styles, then they didn't want the Poor People's March to take place. The government, too, was worried about masses of poor people pitching tents in Washington. What would this do to America's reputation in other countries? What would this do to our image as the richest nation in the world? What about those countries who were not aware of America's racial problems, and problems of poverty and hunger? A Poor People's March on Washington would be an absolute embarrassment to the President of the United States and his entire Cabinet. It would be an embarrassment to all of America. The United States has always been able to hide its poor. People with no jobs, no homes, and no money have always been separated from the rest of American society. There are vagrancy laws that keep these people from being on the street. When they are caught mingling with the so-called decent people, they can be picked up and taken to jail for loitering.

White reaction to the planned Poor People's March was astonishing. A headline in Reader's Digest magazine a few days before King was killed read: "The United States may face a civil crisis this April when a Poor People's Army pitches camp in the nation's capital." The article stated that authorities must be prepared for the worst; a Washington paralyzed by a so-called Poor People's Army. At the White House, the Justice Department, the Pentagon, and the Metropolitan Police Headquarters, dozens of conferences were held to coordinate strategy. All of Washington knew, from the President on down, that if King's Poor People's March really took place, there was a possibility that nearly anything might happen. It could not be predicted, and the government with all its methods of tapping phones and sending out spies did not know how to prepare to handle this massive demonstration that was about to take place. The press was busy trying to find out each and every detail of the march. What would happen if the police told them to move? What if the government ordered an end to the demonstration? What if the police used force to physically remove the crowd? Was there a possibility of violence? And more than anything else, could this thing work without Martin Luther King?

It did work. Ralph Abernathy and other SCLC leaders led thousands into Washington, D.C. They lived in tents through the sweltering summer heat and through many days of hard rain. They were determined to make their voices heard, and they did it without chaos or violence. America had to listen.

PART THREE

CODE NAME "ZORRO"

Chapter Eleven

HOOVER'S FBI

by Mark Lane

The torrent of violence that greeted the nonviolent protesters in Birmingham dramatized again the problem that had beset the civil-rights movement from the beginning: Why was the law not being adequately enforced? No one was naive enough to expect much help from local law-enforcement agencies in the Deep South, but what about the FBI, the federal agency sworn to uphold the Constitution and enforce the laws of the land on behalf of all the people? With its already broad criminal investigative authority, backed by a growing body of Supreme Court decisions and Congressional legislation on civil rights, surely the FBI had all the power necessary both to defend the legal rights of protesters and to arrest the lawbreakers who confronted them with acts of violence.

Why, then, was the law not being adequately enforced? FBI apologists, of course, said that the problem was too big, that the Bureau's manpower was inadequate to cope with widespread civil disorders. But the truth of the matter can hardly be understood solely in those terms. Who were the men who made up J. Edgar Hoover's FBI? What were their motives and how dedicated were they really to enforcing all the laws for all the people? Since Hoover's death the American public has already learned some of the dismaying answers to these questions. In this, and the following three chapters, we shall examine these questions again and try to determine what bearing their answers might have on the murder of Martin Luther King, Jr.

Although books have been written by FBI agents, and reports have been made by committees of the Congress detailing the aberrations, eccentricities, and illegal acts of J. Edgar Hoover's FBI, little has been done to effect a cure.

The reformation of the FBI cannot be achieved by the passing of Hoover. His fifty-year tenure was longer than the reign of most monarches, and certainly longer than that of most dictators. Hoover was able to devise a classic carrot-and-stick employment bureaucracy, so that employees of the FBI became enmeshed in a system that left them little opportunity for free thinking. According to one former employee we talked to, "All the agents ever talked about was ball games and women. And their house. The house that they'd just bought. And their pay raise; mainly their pay raise. Talk about pay raise until you'd go crazy."

Arthur Murtaugh, a special agent of the FBI who retired after serving for twenty years and nine months, has dedicated himself to effective reform of the FBI.

On November 18, 1975, Murtaugh, now practicing law in upper New York State, testified before the House Select Committee on Intelligence, chaired by Otis Pike, Democrat of New York, generally called the Pike Committee. Informing the Committee that he had "loyally served the Bureau for twenty years," and that he had been "assigned to the FBI's internal security intelligence squad in Atlanta for 10 years," he hoped he "could give this Committee insight into the Bureau's intelligence practices not from the theoretical viewpoint of a policymaker but from the practical viewpoint of a field agent."

Charging that "it is possible for the structures of an organization such as the Bureau to be responsible for much wrongdoing without any measurable culpability on the part of individuals working in the lower levels of the organization," Murtaugh gave one example:

I was at one time asked to obtain through my informants handwriting samples of a gentleman who is now a member of your body, the Honorable Andrew Young of Atlanta (now United States Ambassador to the UN). I was also asked to obtain handwriting samples of several of his associates in Dr. Martin Luther King's Southern Christian Leadership Conference. I was an agent with a lot of experience at the time this request came to me from my superiors. I was aware that the manner in which the request was made was such that the information was to be used for one of the illegal purposes of the Bureau.

Murtaugh also said that he was requested to order his informant in the SCLC to steal some letterhead materials. The agent surmised that the plan was to effect a blackmail with forged love letters from "Andy Young to somebody's wife." Murtaugh told his superior that "those fellows at SCLC will laugh at you." Although Hoover's interest in sexual blackmail is well-known, one wonders how seriously love letters on SCLC stationery would have been viewed.

Murtaugh "flatly refused to comply" with the request, made after regular working hours, "orally in private." He turned to his supervisor, who was known among the agents as "Colonel Klink," and told him

... he could tell his counterpart at the Bureau who had called him on the WATS line seeking the information that I knew damn well it was going to be used in an unrecorded counterintelligence operation to destroy Mr. Young's chances of getting elected to the House of Representatives." The request came only a few days after Mr. Young had announced that he was seeking a seat in the House. Murtaugh threatened to go to the Civil Service Commission or to somehow publicize it, so his supervisor backed down and said, "We will make some other arrangement." Assuming that the Bureau failed in this attempt on Mr. Young because his supervisor had no other source at that time who could get the information for him," Murtaugh also remarked that "no record of the above incident" would be found "in the Bureau files."

In an unsigned response to Mr. Murtaugh's testimony, the FBI said: "... a review of the files disclosed no information to support Murtaugh's allegation and that personnel, who would be knowledgeable of such a request of Murtaugh, had no recollection of any such request. FBI headquarters files did not contain information which would substantiate Murtaugh's allegation."

Murtaugh added, in his testimony, that "if the same request had been made to most agents who had reached [my] level in the Bureau . . . they would have routinely complied with their supervisor's request, simply because they would have gone through a process which would have eliminated all those who saw anything wrong with the type of activity contemplated by their supervisor."

An agent with years of Bureau experience explained how this mind set was achieved. Because the Bureau was "exempt from Civil Service" regulations, it was free to set up its own criteria for the selection and training of personnel. [REDACTED]

[REDACTED] Murtaugh, in his testimony, confirmed that "Mr. Hoover was able over a period of nearly 50 years to bring in thousands of carefully selected agent-personnel who were as politically disposed to the right as he was and then through a personnel system, which offered no possibility at all for an agent to question Hoover's ethics or methods, to force thousands of those selected to leave the Bureau in utter disgust simply because they had no avenue through which they could air grievances involving unethical or illegal conduct."

The process of breaking down an agent's resistance to objectionable activities was, besides that of selection, one of occasional choices. A former agent told us. "The average agent on a day-to-day basis might have to falsify a record for some purpose to keep the Bureau from some little scandal, but they'd go through 20 years and they might not have to . . . to any great extent. Except in the little administrative things. They'd have to lie about how many hours they'd worked . . . they broke 'em in on that kind of lying, and then when they got to the point where they had to lie for something big, their character—their self-respect—had been deteriorated." Agents said to one another, "I have absolutely no respect for myself. I am a broken man." Another was reported to have said, "When I shave I close my eyes."

An example of this debilitating dictatorship is the weight program of the Bureau. Arthur Murtaugh suffered personally because, although he did not look or feel overweight, he did not accord with a chart provided to the Bureau by an insurance company.

Hoover was a very clever man—he was a clever dictator. He knew that if he could divide and conquer he'd be successful in controlling people. One of the things he used . . . (was the) . . . weight program. . . . If we just talked about the weight program we'd laugh about it because it in itself was of no importance, but it accomplished the purpose of dividing the troops. . . . some people (couldn't get their weight down to chart weights) . . . the charts were such that it was an absolute impossibility for some of us to get to it. . . . They were later done away with by the . . . insurance company that had recommended them. And they weren't even used the way the company said they should be used.

The weight required, obviously never applied to Hoover, or to John Moore, who was directly under him. Murtaugh's supervisor asked him his weight every day—and Murtaugh insisted on telling the truth. "My supervisor would come and say, 'Who do you weigh, Art? You're supposed to weigh 168.' I'd say I weighed 182 or 187. And he put down 168."

Transfers to undesirable posts were used as punishment. This device was used so arbitrarily and capriciously that the lower echelons in the Bureau developed a defense against it. Murtaugh's noncompliance with the weight charts was eventually discovered and he was ordered transferred. "By the late fifties and sixties, the internal workings of the Bureau had broken down. If Hoover wanted to punish somebody, the manipulators under him would create a kind of cushion between him and us. They'd transfer us—but they'd give us the best damn transfer that we could get!" Murtaugh was transferred from Charlotte, North Carolina, to Atlanta, Georgia.

Hoover's methods of control of over 7,000 agents were worthy of Machiavelli. He always cited national security and efficient law enforcement. In creating the Bureau, Hoover invented an institution that presented a polished, competent exterior to the public, an exterior hard-won by rigid rules of conduct and secrecy. Murtaugh testified, "Secrecy served many useful purposes to the Bureau. It made it impossible for the public or Congress to know anything about what was going on internally. It gave the Bureau operation an aura of mystery and created a type of fear and respect for the Bureau which I personally feel is unhealthy in a society that strives to be both democratic and open."

The FBI's unsigned response to Murtaugh's testimony was: Annual appropriations (for the FBI) were based on Hoover's testimony before Congressional Committees which were at liberty to examine all areas of the Bureau's operations in conducting their inquiry for budget justification. As members of the Congress and representatives of the people, Committee members have always been in a position to know of the Bureau's internal as well as external operations and to make Congress and the general public aware of their observation within their prescribed mandate and subject to the rules of confidence.

Budgets of individual investigations never find their way into reports accessible to the public, however. When three civil rights workers disappeared in Philadelphia, Mississippi, an agent assigned to the investigation reported that the Bureau spent $250,000 a day for over three months, plus over $10,000 for each of the bodies.

"We had about seventy agents on the case, and agents in the field, U-2 flights taking pictures, and about 150 backup agents in the state of Mississippi doing work that was directly related to recovering leads. It was a massive investigation."

An agent said that in a "normal criminal investigation, the Bureau should get high marks, in things like bank robbery, car thefts, kidnappings—there was some doctoring of statistics, but those things were played straight. But," added the same agent, "it was when they got into the intelligence area, an area with political overtones, that things began to break down. The Bureau's approach was so predominantly right, that they might look at an ordinary citizen as a threat to the internal security of the United States. Anybody who wore a beard, in the mid-sixties—they'd take pictures of people in parades and pick the ones with beards—they were the dangerous ones."

An agent who had served in Detroit informed us that the "Two Squad," which was usually an intelligence squad, had conducted an investigation of Walter Reuther because of President Eisenhower's appointment of Reuther to an atomic energy conference in Europe. "The Bureau had to give him a clearance—the Bureau didn't call it that." The agent, in discussing the Reuther investigation with veteran "Two Squad" members, found that the famous Walter Reuther letters which were used against and published in the papers back in the thirties were actually written by a guy who is now a vice-president of General Motors. They were forgeries.

When Reuther was trying to organize the CIO, back in the there were riots and several people were killed and a lot of people to the hospital. During the riots Reuther made a trip to Russia, about 1932 or 33, and during the riots, these letters came out in local papers, and they were allegedly written by Walter Reuther, from Moscow, praising the Communist system.

Reuther denied that he had written the letters—and there is information in the Bureau files to show that this General Motors guy had. I don't know whether the Bureau worked with this guy, using the FBI laboratories to create forgeries, or whether he wrote them independently and the Bureau found out about it. But at any rate, the Bureau never told anybody about this. They let Reuther bear the burden of the allegation. This extreme rightist approach is typical of Bureau history.

Another agent commented that when the FBI had to deal with other than "ordinary criminal behavior," it applied its own standards to formulate a judgment as to correct and moral politics. "Walter Reuther was a rabble-rousing labor leader."

Two agents were assigned to investigate the application of two young women who had applied for clerical positions with the Bureau in Atlanta. "They had worked in a rag-rendering plant in the mid-sixties. They had had a dispute and won it through the National Labor Relations Board. The investigation on their background went up to the Bureau, and Clyde Tolson wrote across it, 'What are we doing, fooling around with people who've been connected with labor unions? Close immediately.' They were denied jobs on the basis that they had something to do with labor unions—this was in the mid-sixties."

An agent who had been with the Bureau for many years remarked that, to J. Edgar Hoover, the Bureau was the "Seat of Government," and that the head office in Washington, D.C., was cryptically referred to by agents as "SOG." Hoover regarded Presidents as transients passing through his administration. "Now to the average agent, after he'd been in fifteen or twenty years, there wasn't any government other than the Bureau. Kennedy couldn't have brought Hoover down, Johnson didn't bring 'em down, and Nixon didn't dare to bring him down—I don't think Nixon wanted to." He added, "Nobody dared cross him, he had built an impregnable dictatorship. It's still there today."

Because the primary mandate of the Bureau was to protect the Bureau's image, agents often were placed in humiliating situations to fulfill this mandate. An agent who had served in Atlanta recalled the plane crash at Orly Field in Paris, in which 130 prominent Atlanta citizens were killed.

The Bureau wanted to get a lot of good publicity out of that situation; they wanted to get in on the identification of the bodies and the French government didn't want to let them in. So we flew the identification crew from the Bureau over to France and then we had to go through Atlanta and collect pantyhose and shoes and bras and things like that and get the sizes from the various families.

Well, the families were all in mourning, and some of these mansion houses were under the control of lawyers, and we had to go through the lawyers in order to get permission to get in. Now this was pertinent information—you've got inheritance rights, was the person actually on the plane, or did they miss it—there was nothing wrong with collecting it.

But we kept having conferences—they had used all the agents in the office—and the conferences didn't concern solution of the case—they dealt with this guy who was the head of the identification unit, who wanted to get a promotion in the Bureau. He was an assistant director who wanted to be an associate director, and he needed this case to go to Hoover as a great publicity success. The only way it could be a great publicity success would be if the press and those involved in the investigation said it was.

So two days after the investigation was finished, we got a call from the Bureau, and this guy, back from France, called in all the Atlanta agents and said, "Gentlemen, I talked to (the assistant director), and he wants us to go back out to the families, and make under pretext some second contact or third contact with them, and subtly suggest to them that they write a letter to the FBI Director, thanking him for the FBI's part in solving this case."

They were still in mourning! And I walked out with some agent, saying, "I'll be damned—I'm not going to cover those leads." I just didn't do it! And some of the other agents didn't do it. Most agents would do it, so that would be enough. Then they could satisfy the Bureau.

Now everyone knew what was going on. The telephone operator talked to me about how rotten it was that they'd ask us to do that sort of thing. Demoralization took place. That was a prelude to (the attempt at) bringing down Dr. King by taking stuff off the wiretap and feeding it to the press. It's all part of the same process. You would have to have a control system and restructure the organization so that the Orly crash incident wouldn't happen. So that a guy wouldn't dare do it!

Another agent reported that the FBI had its own kind of "dirty tricks" operation.

We had files—counterintelligence files where you had to periodically submit schemes for counterintelligence. I had a guy, working under me, to whom this intelligence file was assigned. He was thirty-nine years old—one of the wildest, drinkingest, women running around guys that I have ever known. He would come in the office half croaked nearly every morning.

The intelligence files came up for review every ninety days. So every ninety days he would say—and he used that awful language, he used to swear all the time—slam it down—"I'VE GOT TO WRITE ANOTHER SO-AND-SO!!!" Then he'd come over to me a few minutes later and say, "Hey, give me some ideas." And I would get the steno, and out of the blue think of some kind of a scheme that would satisfy the Bureau. And we'd send it up as a proposal. Every ninety days you had to send something in telling them something dirty we were going to do, in order to accomplish the purpose of counterintelligence.

There was any kind of scheme—it didn't make any difference. They were directed against the Klan as well as against blacks in civil rights, but mostly against blacks.

The Bureau had a penchant for forged letters, and for attacking people on the sex angle. Sex seemed to be—because they were all from the right wing, churchgoing moralists—they figured that's the way you blackmail somebody.

An agent remarked that this attitude was prevalent in areas other than the Bureau.

Nothing surprised me about Watergate—there were no surprises. Nor did it surprise my wife. She was privy enough to all that was going on in the Bureau. We watched the Watergate hearings and we said, "Why doesn't he ask this question? Why doesn't he ask that question?" And the reason they didn't ask the questions was evidenced by what Senator Baker said to McCord once.

He said to McCord, "What I'd like you to do now is go home"—it was Friday—"and think over the weekend what questions we should ask you." Baker could see that he didn't know enough about what was going on to know what kind of questions to ask. I wished to God I could talk to Baker.

They should have gotten some advice. But he wouldn't get the advice elsewhere, because anyone who filters up through the system, and particularly in the Bureau, and in the government generally, goes through this culturization process. By the time he gets to the top, it's very doubtful if his perceptions will be accurate—if he'll be able to see what's going on. He's up there because he wants promotions, he wants power, he's gone through the system, and he has compromised himself.

This same agent, who had served in Detroit, told a story to illustrate how far this "compromise" could extend.

We had jurisdiction in selective service matters, and a guy we'll call "Pedro" was arrested in Chicago and he didn't have a draft card with him. So the police turned him over to the FBI, and Chicago called Detroit, and they said, "Pedro says he's registered with Board 91 on Taylor Street in Detroit." So the supervisor made the phone call, and he made a mistake and didn't check the right board. There are four on Taylor Street and he checked three, not the one Pedro was registered at.

He told Chicago that the guy wasn't registered. Well, Pedro was of a minority, and this was before the Miranda warning, and Pedro was brought before a Federal District judge and asked if he was registered and he said, "Yes, I registered at Taylor Street," and some FBI agent testified, "No, he didn't," and they sent Pedro to jail for eighteen months.

The Bureau didn't find out about this until over two years after it happened. Pedro's number came up at Board 91, and they wanted to know where Pedro was, so they could induct him. They looked for him, and couldn't find him, so they turned the case over to the FBI—told them to find Pedro. They searched the indices and found that—Jesus, we put Pedro in jail for not being registered, now we're looking for him because he was registered.

WE MADE A MISTAKE!

I was with a group of agents in the squad room when this one agent—a loudmouthed little guy whom no one liked—he certainly didn't measure up to my idea of what an agent is—came running into the room showing this to everyone. We all knew the supervisor had made a mistake. He had eight kids. He was going to get transferred.

Then there was a closed-door conference in the supervisor's office—something very unusual. Then this supervisor walks out, and walks into his supervisor's office. And then, nothing happens for another two years.

We hear no more about it until a guy—Charlie—was testifying—he was an accountant for the Bureau—testifying in Grand Rapids, in Federal District Court, and somebody said something derogatory or unfavorable to the Bureau or about the Bureau's investigation and Charlie didn't ask the prosecuting attorney for an opportunity to refute the testimony. It wasn't very important—at least he didn't think so. By the time he got back to the office he had been transferred, because this thing had hit the wire and had gotten to Hoover's office, and the Bureau had been criticized and this guy hadn't defended the Bureau. Hoover transferred him—by teletype. Charlie, normally very reflective, was absolutely beside himself, and he wasn't going to take the transfer.

He quit, took another job, there were lots of jobs at that time. The thing kept stewing at him all the time, "this goddamn Bureau is doing these things to people." We all knew about a lot of things—not as bad as Pedro's—but there were all kinds of coverups on a day-to-day basis. We spent more time covering things up, even in the fifties—a lot more time writing memos covering things up, creating the record—than investigating. It certainly was the more important part of the work.

Anyway, Charlie was bothered so much that he went to a priest, and out of the confessional told him this Pedro thing, and that the Bureau had covered it up. So the Catholic priest, as I got the story, went to Washington, and went to the Bureau. The Bureau, up to this time, knew nothing about Pedro. But the cat was out of the bag, and somebody else knew about Pedro. So the Bureau came to Detroit and the supervisor and his supervisor and the little guy who had found the truth were called into the boss's office. I know all the details of this because the little guy came to see me after he quit.

The boss said, "What's this story about Pedro?" My supervisor says, "Jeez, boss, I don't remember any case like that at all," and his supervisor says, "I don't remember any case like that," and the little guy says, "You lying sons of bitches, you told me to take that case and put all that information about the previous investigation in the details, and to put all the other stuff in the synopsis, and that the Bureau wouldn't catch it because they don't read the details, and that would cover it up." I saw the damn door close with the three of them in the room when it was being talked about!

The supervisor said to the little guy, "We never knew anything about that; you must have just slipped and not put it in the synopsis."

The boss ordered them to go down to the files to see if they could find it. So they started walking down into the files and the two guys were walking on either side of this little guy—his supervisor and his supervisor's supervisor. This little tiny guy, with bulging eyes and great big teeth, was telling them about the case, and they both turned to him and said, "Now, for Christ's sake, don't! We'll tell him we can't find it." Even at this late date they were still lying.

The little guy says, "What do you mean, we can't find it? The damn thing's down there! We talked about it!" The supervisor says, "We never talked about it!" They find the file and bring it back, and the two supervisors persist in stating that they know nothing about it at all.

So the little guy took out his credentials, and his badge and his gun, and threw them down in front of the boss, and said, "If I have to work with a bunch of lying bastards like this, guys, you can take this gun, and credentials, and badge, and do so-and-so with it!" And the boss says, "Well, don't get hot—you're entitled to have it checked out. Who do you know who can tell your side of the story?" The little guy said that he had told the guys in the squad room about it, and named five of us. I wasn't named, for some reason. All five named said they didn't know anything about it, they'd never heard of it. But we'd all discussed it, and we knew as much about that in the Detroit office as we did about the Kennedy killing.

So the little guy said to me later, "When I knew they were all going to lie, I figured—my brother-in-law has a sugar business in Charleston, and offered me a job with $500 more than I was getting in the Bureau, so I figured I was better off to get away from those lying bastards."

I offered to go to the office and write a memorandum and bring it to the boss—this was back about '55 or '56—and blow the whistle on the whole goddamn thing. He said, "Nah, it wouldn't do any good. You can't fight that kind of system." He didn't want me to do it. He said, "I wouldn't take the job back from the Bureau even if they gave it to me." I said, "Okay, if you don't want to do it, we won't do anything about it."

Later, I walked into the office, and saw this one agent, one of the five named, alone there, and went up to him, and said, "Hi, how ya doing?" and he said, "Fine, how are you?" and I said, "Why in Christ's name did you and those other guys throw him to the wolves? He wasn't a nice guy, I didn't like him myself, but why would you lie, and let him get it?"

He said, "Well, the supervisor has eight kids. There's the moral basis. The supervisor couldn't afford the transfer and the little guy could."

And this takes us back to Watergate. Who outside of the Bureau would know the questions to ask? Even those inside the Bureau, asking questions, were not able to get the truth—if they wanted it.

They didn't ask the right questions because they're part of the system and they know which questions to ask, so that they can shape the story the way they want it to come out. That's the way it's done. That's the secret of the whole thing.

Chapter Twelve

ONE MAN

by Mark Lane

Arthur Murtaugh, when he testified before Otis Pike's Select Committee on Intelligence, wept as he told the Committee of his years of frustration and pain, an honest man forced to work against dishonest compromisers.

Although now retired and on a pension, Murtaugh knows he could have retired at a higher grade with a larger pension, if he had been more cooperative.

When Murtaugh failed the weight program, he was transferred. He said,

They had methods worked out so that they could manipulate the transfers and they could kind of cushion the blow. What it amounted to was that the guys who were trying to enforce Hoover's rules had to deal with us because we had so much on them and the organization that they didn't dare fire us. They were afraid that we'd blow the whistle and the whole thing would blow up.

When I was transferred to Atlanta, I went in and told him "I got a royal rooking in Charlotteville. My wife isn't going to move down here until spring, and I need to get on per diem where I can make extra money." He sent me off to Macon, Georgia, to stay for five months on nine dollars a day, which was a lot of money in those days. I got a room at the YMCA—the cheapest one I could get. And I stayed there; there was no work. I was an extra man on the totem pole—just somebody farmed out to cool off. You know, they figured I was madder than hell and if they left me there I'd cool down. They didn't dare fire anybody, because they might have to face the issues before a Civil Service board. They didn't want to be in a position where they'd have to answer for anything because they knew they were wrong in what they were doing.

So I was in the YMCA in Macon, at seven dollars a week and actually making money. There were five agents there. I'd go in, in the morning, and anything they didn't want to do, I'd do. But they didn't need me—I mean they could've gotten along without me. I stayed there five months and I read, I read everything that I could find about dictatorships. I read the life of Martin Luther, and his difficulties with the Pope. I was Catholic and I had gone to the Lutheran College in Pennsylvania. I just went to the library and got all that I could find of the dictators throughout history, from Genghis Kahn down to Adolph Hitler. I read and read, about Catherine the Great, Frederic the Great, the Tudor Dynasties, and the French revolution. Authoritarian systems, and "Jesus," I said to myself, "Hoover read all this stuff. Or he knew about it." The Bureau was a medieval dictatorship. . . . This is the Justice Department of the United States. The Bureau is an integral part of the Justice Department, and yet it is autonomous—no controls, no influence over it, getting stronger and stronger, and the core, Mr. Hoover's people, zombies. There was never any thought of whether anything was right or wrong—if Hoover said it was right, it was right. He was becoming godlike to a lot of us, particularly the old timers.

I saw this as a very dangerous thing. I used to talk to my colleagues in Birmingham during the civil rights troubles, and say, "Look, there will be a Congressional investigation of the FBI and the whole house of cards will come down. This can't work in a democracy, the way he's trying to run it." And they would always say, "You're right, Art, but there's nothing we can do about it."

Everything in the Bureau was secondary to how one was going to survive as an agent. The work itself was secondary. The questions were always who was going to get clobbered; was somebody going to go to the press; were they going to blow the lid on the Bureau? We had to do our work, cover our leads. But the interests of the agents centered around—if the Bureau comes down, are my kids going to be able to hold their heads up at school?

In 1960 I made up my mind. I decided I'd stay in the Bureau and I'd get to retirement, but I wouldn't violate the law, and I wouldn't lie. That was a hard order to come by in the Bureau.

The other agents tolerated me—"Art's a nice guy, but he's crazy, you know, he won't roll with the punches, he calls the shots the way they are." I had one boss who told me, "Art, I have a lot of respect for your principles, but you have to decide"—this was in 1968—"whether to give up your principles or get out of the Bureau. There's no room in the Bureau for a man of principle."

These circumstances, through the years, got me to a point where, by the time I retired, I was just washed out. I wasn't healthy. I had an intestinal tumor that had probably been there as much as fifteen or twenty years, and it was never taken care of because I kept moving around all the time. Because of the stand Murtaugh took, he was never compelled to commit perjury.

I think it was a matter of policy. The Bureau thought nothing of lying to protect itself . . . the main tool by which Hoover controlled his seven thousand men. But it didn't work, and resulted in the ultimate downfall of the Bureau.

Why did I make that decision in 1960? Well, I have seven kids, and my education, even though I graduated from law school, is not such that I can go out and get a comparable job anywhere.

Here's another part of the Bureau structure: the public was told that the Bureau had lawyers and accountants, but they hired football players and bank tellers with B.A. degrees and night school attendees who worked in the Bureau as clerks and just barely got enough hours together to get a degree. The Bureau would then make an agent of them, and they'd jump from $7,500 a year to $18,000 in a matter of a few months; they had no hope of getting anything comparable to that on the outside, because they had no particular expertise that they could sell. Only 7 percent of the work force in the Bureau were lawyers and accountants.

Even though I was a part of that 7 percent, my family background made me Depression oriented. I had a great lack of confidence in myself, in my ability to make it in life.

The Murtaugh family had settled in the upper New York State area, from Ireland, in 1841, and had never been able to make money or get any real security.

Murtaugh was sickly as a child, and his development was very slow. At fourteen years old, I only weighed seventy-two pounds. I had something wrong with my throat. Every winter I had tonsillitis three or four times. I'd sit in school and fall asleep. I was in the first grade for two years and the second grade for a year and a half.

When I got into the seventh grade my mother finally decided I was sick. This wasn't through ignorance; it was a lack of medical care and lack of money. We owed the doctor $86.00 through the Depression and I used to hear my mother and father talking about how they couldn't pay the doctor.

Finally I came home one Friday, while in the seventh grade, at noon. My mother counted around the table, and I wasn't there. One of the eight was gone. She came up, put her hand on my head and said, "My God, you've got a fever! It must be 106!!" And then they called the doctor.

That was the first time I saw the doctor, that I could remember, in six or seven years. The doctor said he thought I had tuberculosis and would die. They took the tonsils out, and I bled for months.

Then I went back to school and in the seventh grade I put on weight and grew taller and began to be able to learn. I got to where I could read a little.

I couldn't read at all, before that, I couldn't even read the newspaper, and I was in the seventh grade. Once my aunt gave me a Saturday Evening Post, and it took me three days to read a four-page article about some American scientists that went to Russia.

Then I went to high school and had a sense of being intelligent. I did fairly well in high school. I was in the honor society and in areas where I didn't have to read—like math—I got straight A's. Then into college and the service, and out of the service into more college, and then law school. I finally got to be a very accurate reader, although very slow. But once I've read something, it's memorized.

All of my youthful problems affected me terribly; I was almost twenty-one when I finished high school. This can't be the sort of thing that builds confidence in a young man. By thirty I was a lawyer and admitted to the New York State Bar.

I went into the Bureau because I wasn't sure I could make it elsewhere. I also wanted to make some money—still Depression-oriented. I drive old cars—because I won't be in debt. I've never used credit of any kind. I've been frugal my whole life. All of this has something to do with my unwillingness to give up something that was sure financial security—the Bureau.

I knew what was wrong, and not to be corrected. Trying to correct it at the time, while I was in the Bureau, would have been hopeless and disastrous. So I waited.

When the Watergate breakin first appeared in the news, Murtaugh's first question to himself was "What part did the Bureau and Nixon have in it."

Murtaugh waited some more. "I had never criticized the Bureau publicly. But then the Senate Watergate hearings started and I watched them for about three days and I said this is it, the whole house of cards is coming down and I'm going to be there when it falls."

Murtaugh wrote to The New York Times to offer what information he had, especially with regard to the illegal activities involved in the Martin Luther King investigation. A Times reporter went up to see Murtaugh, who said, "that was the beginning of the world beating a pathway to my door. Two weeks don't pass before someone calls or comes to see me . . . sometimes there are two or three a week."

Murtaugh's interest, as he has consistently told all the media and the Pike Committee, is in a "complete restructuring" of the Bureau. "Without that, we'd just be treading water."

Murtaugh wants to be sure that the abuses of the enforcement and intelligence agencies are made public.

Unless the younger generation learns about this, they're going to forget, and think they can wash it all clean with Mr. Clean. We could put Jesus Christ at the top of the Bureau and he could not change it unless the structure is changed.

Those who have to carry out the dirty work, Murtaugh feels, are the ones who need an opportunity to speak out. "Who knows about wrongdoing in government? Is it the guys at the top, or is it the clerks and secretaries at the bottom. Who knew that there was a wiretap on King? Who typed some of the memos? Some of the stenos and clerks came to me at different times—they knew that the system was rotten."

Murtaugh believes that a thorough reconstruction of the Bureau will achieve what the Bureau had promised its recruits:

A due process system would work—it would be fair and better than secrecy, and the resulting image would make them proud to have their kids go to school and say they were an FBI agent's children.

Chapter Thirteen

THE OBSESSION

by Mark Lane

The United States Senate, through its Select Committee to study Governmental Operations with respect to Intelligence Activities (popularly known as the Church Committee) concluded in its final report:

The Committee finds that covert action programs have been used to disrupt the lawful political activities of individual Americans and groups and to discredit them, using dangerous and degrading tactics which the abhorrent in a free and decent society. . . . The sustained use of such tactics by the FBI in an attempt to destroy Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., violated the law and fundamental human decency.

The Senate Committee which issued the report represented the disparate philosophies and politics found within the Senate. Among the members of the Select Committee were liberals such as its Chairman, Frank Church, Walter F. Mondale, moderates such as Howard Baker, and conservatives such as its Vice Chairman, John G. Tower, and Barry Goldwater.

The chilling language of the Committee report is underscored by the refusal of the FBI to make available to the Select Committee evidence regarding its most extreme programs to destroy Dr. King.

For example, the Committee learned that Hoover's pathological obsession with Dr. King was so grand that even after Dr. King was murdered the FBI continued its attempts to discredit him and his widow, Coretta King. During March 1969, the Congress was considering a resolution to declare Dr. King's birthday a national holiday. The Crime Records Division of the FBI recommended briefing members of the relevant Committee of Congress considering the resolution because "they were in a position to keep the bill from being reported out of Committee" if "they realize King was a scoundrel." Cartha De Loach wrote. "This is a delicate matter—but can be handled very cautiously." Hoover wrote back. "I agree. It must be handled very cautiously."

The following month the Atlanta Field Office submitted a recommendation for a counterintelligence program "in the event the Bureau is inclined to entertain counterintelligence action against Coretta Scott King and/or the continuous projection of the public image of Martin Luther King." Hoover evidently had determined that the time was not right for the suggested action against Mrs. King or Dr. King's memory. He therefore informed the Atlanta office that "the Bureau does not desire counterintelligence action against Coretta King of the nature you suggest at this time." The Select Committee was unable to secure any further information about the nature of the proposed program because the FBI, which ostensibly was investigating, decided not to share the evidence with the members of the Senate Committee. The Select Committee reported only "the nature of the proposed program has not been revealed to the Committee."

On November 18, 1975, Frederick A. O. Schwarz, Jr., chief counsel, and Curtis R. Smothers, minority counsel of the Church Committee, testified before the Committee regarding the results of their investigation. In questioning them, Senator (now Vice President) Mondale summarized the evidence "and the tactics they [the FBI] used [against Dr. King] apparently had no end." He then made specific reference to the methods employed by Hoover and his associates against King. "They included wiretapping. They included microphonic surveillance of hotel rooms. They included informants. They included sponsoring of letters signed by phony names to relatives and friends and organizers. They involved even plans to replace him with someone else whom the FBI was to select as a national civil rights leader." The record reveals that, as Mondale continued, counsel confirmed the accuracy of his summary, on occasion offering additional information.

Senator Mondale: It also included an indirect attempt to persuade the Pope not to see him.

Mr. Schwarz: And many other people.

Senator Mondale: It directed him to persuade one of our major universities not to grant him a doctorate degree.

Mr. Schwarz: That is correct. I think there were two universities.

Senator Mondale: It included an attempt to send him a letter prior to the time he received the Nobel Peace Prize, which Dr. Martin Luther King and close associates interpreted to mean a suggestion that King should attempt suicide.

Mr. Schwarz: That's right. Included in that were materials which the Bureau had gathered illegally or improperly through tapes and bugs and so forth.

Mondale then responded to his partial accounting of the evidence: "I must conclude that apart from direct physical violence and apart from illegal incarceration, there is nothing in this case that distinguishes that particular action much from what the KGB does with dissenters in that country. I think it is a road map to the destruction of American democracy."

Hoover began to travel that road regarding Dr. King during February 1962. The Church Committee said that it could not determine if "Hoover's animosity toward Dr. King" influenced the FBI's decision to initiate a "COMINFIL" (Communist infiltration) investigation of him "without full access to the Bureau's files." Again, the FBI had decided not to share the evidence with the Senate Committee authorized to investigate it. In January 1962, the Southern Regional Council released a report which was critical of the failure of the FBI to take action during civil rights demonstrations in Albany, Georgia. The report was updated and issued in November 1962. Press reports about the document were forwarded to the FBI office in Washington, D.C. FBI regulations seemed to require that the specific allegations in the report be examined. The Bureau rules provided that allegations about FBI misconduct had to be investigated and that "every logical lead which will establish the true facts should be completely run out unless such action would embarrass the Bureau." The FBI's determination to secure, as the Bureau so oddly put it, "true facts" appeared to be tempered by a Catch-22 clause. How could an honest investigation of a valid charge of FBI misconduct not embarrass the Bureau? In this instance the conundrum was avoided as the FBI decided to conduct no investigation of the charges, to describe the report as "slanted and biased" even before the full report was received, and to begin an investigation of its author instead.

Soon after the report was issued, Dr. King was quoted in the press as having said that he agreed with the conclusions in the report and that the FBI had failed to adequately investigate civil violations in Albany. He said:

One of the great problems we face with the FBI in the South is that the agents are white Southerners who have been influenced by the mores of the community. To maintain their status, they have to be friendly with the local police and people who are promoting segregation.

Every time I saw FBI men in Albany, they were with the local police force.

The SAC of the Atlanta FBI office immediately notified headquarters about those remarks. The FBI concluded that Dr. King's comments "would appear to dovetail with information" the Bureau knew of "indicating that King's advisors are Communist Party (CP) members and that he is under the domination of the CP." To Hoover and his associates any criticism of the FBI was proof that a critic was a Communist. The Bureau officials decided to meet with Dr. King in order to "set him straight." After considerable thought was given as to who should contact King it was decided that he should be contacted by both Assistant FBI Director William Sullivan and Assistant FBI Director Cartha De Loach "in order that there be a witness and there can be no charge of provincialism inasmuch as Cartha De Loach comes from the South and Mr. Sullivan comes from the North." Two telephone calls were made to the busy and often hectic office of the SCLC in Atlanta. King was not in on either occasion and when he failed to return the calls De Loach wrote:

It would appear obvious that Rev. King does not desire to be told the true facts. He obviously used deceit, lies, and treachery as propaganda to further his own cause. . . . I see no further need to contacting Rev. King as he obviously does not desire to be given the truth. The fact that he is a vicious liar is amply demonstrated in the fact he constantly associates with and takes instructions from (a) . . . member of the Communist Party.

Hoover detested criticism, blacks, and movements for change. Dr. King epitomized all that threatened Hoover's tenuous hold on reality. The head of the Domestic Intelligence Division during the harassment of Dr. King. He later testified that Hoover "was very upset about the criticism that King made publicly about our failure to protect the Negro in the South against violations of the Negro civil liberties" and that "I think behind it all was the racial bias, the dislike of Negroes, the dislike of the civil rights movement."

He detested criticism, blacks, and movements for change. Dr. King epitomized all that threatened Hoover's tenuous hold on reality. The FBI's unholy war against Dr. King was on. Before it ended Dr. King would lie dead on a motel balcony in Memphis.

In May 1962, the FBI included Dr. King's name on "Section A of the Reserve Index" as a person to be rounded up and imprisoned in the event of a national emergency.

During October 1962, the FBI began an investigation of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC) and of its president, Dr. King. The FBI conducted the investigation under a provision in its manual captioned COMMINT—an acronym for Communist Infiltration. That provision authorized investigations into "Legitimate Noncommunist Organizations that are Communist Infiltrated" in order to determine the extent of the alleged Communist influence. If the FBI excesses visited upon Dr. King and his associates were a road map to the destruction of democracy, the assumption that the government, through its federal police, had the right to examine, through methods legal or illegal, the constitutionally protected exercises of citizens constitute the compass that pointed the way. Yet it was that basic assumption that Hoover shared with President John F. Kennedy, Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, President Lyndon B. Johnson, and others in positions of influence including Burke Marshall, Nicholas Katzenbach, and Byron R. White. The wide-ranging investigations into the SCLC and of Dr. King were conducted with the knowledge of the Attorney General in 1962. The investigation which was largely carried out through the illegal use of electronic surveillance and through the use of informants were predicated upon the suspicion that one of Dr. King's advisers was a Communist. Fourteen years after the investigation began Burke Marshall, the Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights from 1961-65, testified that he "never had any reason to doubt [the FBI's] allegation concerning" the adviser. He added that the charges against the adviser were "grave and serious."

After Hoover and Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy conferred, President Kennedy decided to send Marshall to meet with Dr. King and urge him to disassociate from his adviser. Marshall did meet with Dr. King and Andrew Young. When Young later testified before the Church Committee he said that Marshall said at the meeting that the FBI had informed the Justice Department that there was in fact Communist influence in the civil rights movement and had explicitly mentioned the adviser. When Young asked Marshall for proof that the adviser was a Communist he said that he had none, and that he "couldn't get anything out of the Bureau."

Proof was still lacking thirteen years later. The Church Committee concluded that it was shown no evidence that demonstrated that the adviser was a member of the Communist Party at any time during the entire FBI COMMINT investigation. The failures of the Church Committee were numerous. It failed to secure what were likely the most relevant and illuminating FBI documents; it failed to publish many of the documents that it did receive with the exception of a few excerpts; it failed to publish the testimony of those who appeared before it. Yet perhaps its greatest failure was in its reluctance to challenge the concept that the government has the right, indeed the obligation, to monitor the lawfully protected actions of the people.

Burke Marshall occupied a position in the Justice Department which imposed upon him the primary responsibility for the administration of equal justice to those struggling for equal rights. Dr. King and his associates felt that it was to Marshall that they must look for protection against those violently committed to segregation. They saw Marshall and the two Kennedys as a bulwark against the excesses of the local police and the Hoover regime. In the end it appeared that both the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations shared with Hoover the belief that the government had the duty to determine which private citizens could give lawful advice to other private citizens. Starting from that premise, which contemplates governmental intrusion into private sectors of life, all that remained to be determined were the methods to be utilized and the extent of the intrusions.

The most sensitive survivors of the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations shrink when they are informed of the details of the war that Hoover launched against Dr. King. Sensitive as they are and as appalled as they may be when they hear of the atrocities in the trenches, the singularly important fact that emerges from the investigation by the Church Committee is the inescapable conclusion that they, the technicians in the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, had declared war against Dr. King.

The Church Committee wrote:

The extent to which Government officials outside of the FBI must bear responsibility for the FBI's campaign to discredit Dr. King is not clear. Government officials outside of the FBI were not aware of most of the specific FBI actions to discredit Dr. King. Officials in the Justice Department and White House were aware, however, that the investigation, of Dr. King; that the FBI had written authorization from the Attorney General to wiretap Dr. King and the SCLC offices in New York and Washington; and that the FBI reports on Dr. King contained considerable information of a political and personal nature which was 'irrelevant and spurious' to the stated reasons for the investigation. Those high executive branch officials were also aware that the FBI was disseminating vicious characterizations of Dr. King within the Government; that the FBI had tape recordings embarrassing to Dr. King which it had offered to play to a White House official and to reporters; and that the FBI had offered to 'leak' to reporters highly damaging accusations that some of Dr. King's advisers were communists. Although some of those officials did ask top FBI officials about these charges, they did not inquire further after receiving false denials. In light of what those officials did know about the FBI's conduct toward Dr. King, they were remiss in failing to take appropriate steps to curb the Bureau's behavior. To the extent that their neglect permitted the Bureau's activities to go on unchecked, those officials must share responsibility for what occurred.

Perhaps the ultimate irony is found in the current evaluation of that period by the FBI. Testifying for the Bureau in an appearance before the Church Committee, the Deputy Associate Director, James Adams, said, "I see no statutory basis or no basis of justification for the activity . . . as far as the activities which you are asking about, the discrediting, I know of no basis for that and I will not attempt to justify it."

Yet at the time the unjustified and illegal programs were not challenged. FBI Assistant Director William C. Sullivan testified that he "never heard anyone raise the question of legality or constitutionality, never." Sullivan was in charge of the program.

He told the Church Committee:

No holds were barred. We have used (similar) techniques against Soviet agents. (The same methods were) brought home against any organization against which we were targeted. We did not differentiate. This is a rough, tough business.

He also said:

This is a common practice, rough, tough, dirty business. Whether or not we should be in it or not, that is for you folks to decide. We are in it. To repeat, it is a rough, tough, dirty business, and dangerous. It was dangerous at times—that is, dangerous to the persons who are being affected, not to the Bureau persons—when you are trying to disrupt someone's family life. It was dangerous at times, no holds were barred. We have used that technique against foreign espionage agents, and they have used it against us.

The FBI, employing almost every intelligence-gathering technique in its arsenal, collected information about Dr. King, his family, his activities, his plans and his associates.

During September 1963, the FBI conducted a survey of Dr. King's home and the New York office of the SCLC. On October 7, Hoover requested permission from Attorney General Robert Kennedy for a wiretap "on King at his current address or at any future address to which he may move" and "on the SCLC office at the current New York address or to any other address to which it may be moved." On October 10, Kennedy signed the request and, on October 21, he also approved Hoover's request to wiretap the SCLC's Atlanta office. In making his application to Kennedy, Hoover did not allege that any criminal conduct might be uncovered. He cited only the "possible communist influence in the racial situation." Predictably Hoover interpreted the Attorney General's permission to wiretap King "at any future address" broadly and therefore placed wiretaps on telephones in hotel and motel rooms where King stayed and on the telephones of friends with whom he stayed temporarily. Telephones in the homes and offices of Dr. King's advisers were also wiretapped. In addition to wiretapping, the FBI placed concealed microphones in Dr. King's motel and hotel rooms in an "attempt to obtain information about the private activities of King and his advisers for use to 'completely discredit' them.

Tape recordings made on these occasions were "improved" at the FBI electronics laboratory and then played for friendly reporters. This technique was employed in an effort to develop "friendly" news sources who would publish derogatory information about Dr. King and to discourage objective reporters from writing fair stories about him.

On a personal note I might add that similar techniques were utilized against me by the FBI as I looked into the assassinations. FBI agents have made similarly "improved" and fabricated material available to contacts in the news media, to members of Congress, and to the late President Lyndon B. Johnson.

The Church Committee, through the efforts of Senator Richard Schweiker, discovered through the questioning of James Adams that in 1966, just after Rush to Judgment was published, a request was made by the White House for "personal data information and dossiers," on seven Warren Commission critics. Adams admitted that the request was not a normal one, since it by-passed the Attorney General. Adams explained:

This is not a normal procedure. It is not the procedure followed today. There was a period of time where, at the President's directions, Mr. Hoover reported more directly to him in certain areas, and it was apparently a feeling that he did not want the Attorney General to know certain things.

Adams agreed, when specifically asked by Sen. Schweiker, that a dossier did include documents regarding the sexual activities of a critic.

Schweiker understood that the technique employed by the FBI against Dr. King and his associates was also used against Warren Commission critics. He said:

I think what concerns the committee is, that whenever you get to the nitty-gritty of investigations—and it doesn't relate to the Warren Commission, I will leave that alone—we get back to something like a photograph or a tape recording or some letter referring to some kind of human weakness or failing that is really very irrelevant to the investigation, is sandwiched in here. It just seems to me that it was a tactic. This just happens to be the Warren Commission I singled out, but it was a tactic that was trying to discover, as an example, the fact that I am [redacted] that or dispute that? What rationale would you use? Do we use sexual activities as a standard criterion for investigations?

Schweiker added:

And my question is, how is that relevant to being a critic of the Warren Commission? What standard do we use when we just pass photographs of sexual activities to the White House? Is this a normal proceeding when a dossier is requested? Is this normally included, or did they specifically request photographs of this kind, or what light can you shed on this?

And the FBI's Deputy Associate Director replied:

I can't shed much. I know they requested information on him. I think there was other material concerning that individual of a security nature that was included. Why the information in that respect was submitted I am unable to answer. I do know at the time there was a lot of concern following the Warren Commission report. Had all the answers been explored? Was the Soviet Union involved? Was Cuba involved? And who were the critics who now are attacking this? But I have seen nothing which would explain the rationale for requesting the material.

When Schweiker asked "what other purpose would a photograph of this nature have, other than to discredit critics?" Adams replied, "I can't answer that."

I have explored this rather personal area at some length because unhappily it does not belong to the past alone. Even as I worked on this book during the closing days of 1976, the documents referred to by Sen.

Schweiker were being circulated among members of the Washington press corps, primarily to "friendly" FBI news sources and to various members of the Congress. The purpose—to discourage the Congress from responding to the call for a thorough inquiry into the murder of Dr. King and President Kennedy by attempting to discredit a man who has issued that call.

Thus the techniques used by the FBI to discredit Dr. King during his life are presently being used to discredit those who wish to learn about his death.

A microphone concealed in a hotel where King stayed picked up sounds of a party at which he was present. According to the Department of Justice, [REDACTED] the tape recording indicated sexual activity. The problem with the tape, [REDACTED] conceded, is that it did not really relate King to the sexual activity and one could barely hear King's voice. Hoover and his friend Clyde Tolson decided to send the tape to Coretta King in an effort to cause the family to break up. William Sullivan testified that the tape was intended to precipitate a separation between Dr. King and his wife in the belief that the separation would reduce his stature.

Hoover ordered the FBI laboratory to "improve" or doctor the tapes so that Dr. King's voice could be clearly heard in a context that would prove embarrassing. The tape was then sanitized, that is, all fingerprints were removed from it. It was placed in a package which was also sanitized and then mailed to the SCLC. Hoover ordered that the tape be mailed "from a Southern state." Accordingly, an FBI agent flew to Florida with the small package, mailed it and then flew home. Hoover evidently reasoned that King would be emotionally weakened from the confrontation with his wife and the impending separation. He therefore ordered that a letter be sent to Dr. King, a letter that Dr. King and his advisers interpreted to mean that he would be publicly exposed if he did not commit suicide within the next thirty-four days. The letter was dispatched thirty-four days before Dr. King was scheduled to receive the Nobel Prize.

Hoover's conceived plot was seriously flawed. It was white-oriented and bureaucratically programmed. It certainly did not contemplate the problems and strengths of the civil rights movement. Hoover, Tolson, and Sullivan, for all their intelligence-gathering devices and their techniques and equipment for surveillance, had not even begun to understand the pace and priorities of the movement. Hoover knew that a personal tape addressed to him would be on his desk and analyzed shortly after its arrival.

The arrival of a tape at Atlanta office of the SCLC was not a signal event. Tapes came in all the time. The SCLC was collecting tape recordings of Dr. King's speeches. This one took its place near the bottom of a substantial pile of tapes, packages, and letters. Eventually the tape was listened to. Coretta King heard it as did Dr. King. He read the letter as well. The sanitizing had removed FBI fingerprints, the old typewriter that had been used could not be traced, and the postmark read Florida, not Washington, D.C. However, to Dr. King the origin was clear. This ultimate scurrilous action—including what he believed (and many others have since come to believe) was a clear suggestion that he kill himself—could have come, he reasoned, only from J. Edgar Hoover.

The following day Dr. King met with Ralph Abernathy and Andrew Young. He had the tape played for them. Sadly, King said that he then knew that he could never again trust the FBI to protect him.

Chapter Fourteen

THE DESTROY KING SQUAD

by Mark Lane

J. Edgar Hoover's attitude toward civil rights activists was evident from the first. An agent who served in Georgia in the early sixties reported that the ways the Bureau had chosen to deal with this delicate and potentially dangerous matter were hardly satisfactory:

This was in Albany, Georgia, in the early sixties, during demonstrations. I observed, in court, Dr. King, and Asa Kelly, the mayor, and the Judge—a Federal District judge whom I had investigated for the job—the mayor, the Judge and I were the only white people in the crowded courtroom. Constance Motley, now a District Judge in New York, represented Dr. King.

King and the city of Albany were seeking cross-injunctions against one another. FBI agents were dispatched from Atlanta to Albany to investigate the demonstrations.

The personnel situation at Albany was unbelievable. We had a guy at the office nicknamed RN. . . . He was a Special Agent in Charge (SAC). RN was forty-five years old then. He had come up in the Bureau when it expanded from 600 to 6,000. He was not excessively bright. . . .

Nobody had any respect for RN. He got interested in women when he hit the big salary, just about the time we hit Albany, Georgia. . . . If this had gotten to the Bureau, it would have resulted in forty or fifty agents being transferred from Atlanta.

His behavior could have been reported. But it wasn't—the personnel structure of the Bureau was so decayed that an agent could challenge a supervisor with, "You can't do it to me—the consequences are too severe!"

RN was SAC of the task force that went down to Albany. Another character in this story is nicknamed SF, the local agent in charge, in the field, what we call a resident agent. There was another local agent also, but he didn't count for anything—this Albany agent was second in command to RN when he came down. There were five agents in Albany when this case went to court, and RN and SF were pitted against the other three agents. They hated each other vehemently. . . . Some of it was religious-oriented. They couldn't stand being in the same rooms together, the three and the two.

The two brought down to Albany forty agents, and set up an office in the Holiday Inn, collecting information on the King demonstrations.

SF called the shots. He was better equipped to be the Grand Cyclops of the Ku Klux Klan. When he met me at the office, he said, "You want to be careful here. I just talked to my wife, and I told her not to come downtown. Be sure to keep all the doors locked. We've got an explosive situation—just don't take any chances, whatever you do. You can't tell how long it'll be before this thing blows sky high!" I went out later to find out what he was talking about—one hundred bedraggled, beaten-down blacks, surrounded by about four hundred policemen, who were marching around the block once or twice a day in protest against not being able to use the library.

SF controlled the Bureau's response to these activities. The civil rights cases in the Bureau, including police brutality cases, went through the office with special handling. They were even on different colored paper—green.

An agent familiar with this procedure explained, "The Bureau handled civil rights cases by collecting information and turning it over to the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department in a type of preliminary communication." Agents were not empowered to interview, in a police brutality case, the sheriff, the officer, or the victim until the Bureau responded to the preliminary communication and ordered the interview. The Bureau's response was always very specific, naming those to be interviewed, and ordering that the agent inform the interviewer that the investigation had been ordered by a particular Assistant Attorney General, head of the Criminal Justice Division of the Department of Justice.

"The reason we told them that was because Hoover didn't want to be connected with any civil rights investigations," said an agent who had served in Albany. "This was the only time when we told anyone that the Justice Department was ordering us to conduct an investigation. In any other kind of case, the Bureau would be glad to take credit—shipping, interstate commerce—we'd let someone know we were saving their ship or their trucks.

Hoover wanted to minimize the responsibility of the Bureau for civil rights. His way of doing it was to have guys like SF in key positions throughout the states. He didn't have to pick them and put them there—the system caused them to gravitate there. His type was a racist who didn't want any part of civil rights, and wouldn't ask the right questions.

Arthur Murtaugh added,

The whole thing was structured so that we weren't going to scratch the surface on the civil rights cases, unless we were forced into it as we were in Philadelphia. Bobby Kennedy had, at that time—it was unheard of—a bunch of bearded assistants, who would go out to interview the blacks who had sent in civil rights complaints, and they would ask them what had happened. They would get a different story from the one we were giving on the green sheets at the Bureau.

King got word of this, and three or four blacks told me, and other agents, this—they were terrified of SF. He was a good guy to sit down with and talk to—as long as you were white—but he instructed all the new men who came to Albany not to shake hands with any black people—he said, "We don't do that down here!"

The situation was getting quite active—the Klan was shooting into houses at night, and burning churches. SF was manipulating the civil rights investigation. Dr. King called a news conference and said that the FBI wasn't doing its job.

Well, I was there, and I know that the FBI wasn't doing its job—it didn't surprise me; and I don't suppose that it surprised the Bureau—but that was the beginning of the vendetta against King. From that time on, the concentration of effort against King was greater than any other single investigation that I saw take place at the Bureau and I saw a lot of them in twenty years. There was a crew of people who did almost nothing for a period of seven or eight years, except investigate King and try to destroy him.

Murtaugh added that while the anti-King effort came mostly out of the Atlanta office, it also came out of the New York and Washington field offices, and "some other" offices had a part in it.

"It was an organized vendetta. They were going to get King in one way or another."

At first, it was difficult for Murtaugh and other agents to perceive the anti-King effort as a personal one: "I thought that it was just that the Bureau was anti-civil rights and that King represented the movement.

I knew enough about the phony Communist domination theory on King to know that it had no validity. In fact, the whole Communist scare, even through the fifties, fell flat on its face because it didn't have any substance. I don't mean that there weren't some Communists, but they never were in a position to do us internal harm of any significance, and most agents that knew what was going on would agree with that.

Murtaugh saw a shift from efforts against Roy Wilkins, Whitney Young, James Farmer, Stokely Carmichael, H. "Rap" Brown, and Huey Newton, to an intense concentration on King. "The Bureau was even considering trying to substitute a leader that they could control. I saw many memoranda on this—they were going to try to take over the movement and direct it from the Bureau. But they couldn't get to first base," Murtaugh said.

Murtaugh worked with two men in the Atlanta office who were in charge of the wiretaps on Dr. King.

There was Al Santinella and Bob Nichols. I liked them both—and I could never agree, but we were gentlemanly and pleasant with one another. Al I had a lot of respect for. A quiet guy, with little to say—but I could tell from the little bit he did say, that he was anti-King in the early sixties, and by the time the whole thing was over, he felt that the Bureau (performance) was a travesty, that they shouldn't have taken King in. He told me, years later, that he didn't think the Bureau had any substantive grounds for the wiretap on King, and that he was satisfied that King wasn't involved in any Communist movement, which could have justified the wiretap. And I think that he never approved of the peddling of the information, to the media, from the wiretap, which in fact was a clear violation of the law. I think he would not have done it by himself.

The Bureau maintained a two-bedroom apartment in the Peach Street Towers in Atlanta, close to the office, where the wiretap surveillance on King was conducted. "In that apartment, one of the rooms had panels; the whole room was filled with wiretap equipment. They had a man there all the time, twenty-four hours a day, monitoring the equipment and recording things he thought were pertinent . . .," Murtaugh said.

This was all about King. They wrote down every word that transpired over the King telephone, and identified all of the people involved. It was estimated one time that there were five or six thousand people that the wiretap actually got information on—people that called him. My own doctor was on that file. My doctor, a white man, was active in the King movement. He and his wife were both graduates of Harvard medical school. We were neighbors and good friends.

I found his name when going through the wiretap files one time—all of it was longhand notes. There was a string of file cabinets twenty or more feet long, starting with Day One in the wiretap, and every single communication that took place. This was a form—the number called from, the number of the person who answered. Identity of the person; what was said. And so on. The files were in a special room, the room I worked in for eleven years.

Murtaugh's squad was not just criminal or intelligence, but a hash of both. "We called it the security squad. We hadn't racial matters, applicant investigations, even antitrust. Very bluntly—I hate to say this—the more intelligent, better-educated would be apt to be on this squad. If there was an investigation where one had to talk to bankers—they would need someone who could handle that kind of work, someone smooth. The ex-ball player would go in the bank robbery squad." Wiretaps, when conducted legally, are performed at the order of an appropriate judge or official, after a showing of probable cause. The use of information received from wiretaps as evidence is so restricted and subject to challenge by a good defense attorney that it often seems hardly worth it. Murtaugh said that the justification for the wiretap on King was based on an investigation that had been conducted before the wiretap was begun.

You'd have to have a whole staff to investigate just that area. I think this happened. Bobby Kennedy was Attorney General and he signed the order permitting the wiretap. There were agents, oriented to the right, who investigated King in New York and found a lawyer working with him. . . . (The lawyer) had had a flirtation with the Communist Party back in the late forties. He'd been to meetings and worked with the CP in New York, so you would say that he was connected with it and at that time probably subscribed to some of the CP concepts.

Whether . . . (the lawyer) changed his view is neither here nor there. I don't think he had that much influence over Dr. King—and the things that he encouraged, King had a perfect right legally to do, and had nothing to do with Communist domination or influence. To be a dangerous Communist, you'd have to steal government secrets and feed them to the Russians.

But if you encourage a bus boycott in Montgomery, is that Communist or not? It may cause riots and riots are associated with Communist activity. Discord in the community is an opportunity for the Communists to take over. That may be true, part of the Communist doctrine and tactics.

But labor unions demonstrate also, and there could be a riot—it depends on who pushes first, who shoots first.

I never saw anything to indicate that King was influenced to create riots. Whether that was in King's mind was also in . . . (the lawyer's) mind when they decided to demonstrate under certain circumstances—remember in Birmingham, when the Catholic priests begged King not to demonstrate, that it would create chaos?

I could see that it would create chaos. But I wouldn't see any other way, how the situation in Birmingham would change, without chaos. As long as demonstrations were prevented in Birmingham, the segregationists could not be broken. If the segregationists started to riot, then they were the Communists, as far as I was concerned.

I saw it that way, and so did a few agents. But most of the agents, in the early sixties, figured this to be Communist rabble-rousing.

The Bureau carefully refrained from instructing its agents on any of King's or the Southern Christian Leadership Conference's ideology. It preferred instead to place a convenient label on that behavior. King achieved a melding, peculiarly for the American people, of Christian principles and Gandhian demonstrations of nonviolent civil disobedience. He knew, through long years of study and prayer, exactly what his ideals were and their sources; and he used this blend to force the Constitution to come alive.

This thrilling revitalization of its origins were treated by the Bureau with the deepest ignorance. One agent assigned to listen to King's conversations commented, after listening to King and . . . [the lawyer] that King had "stood fast" against a suggestion by . . . [the lawyer] that King rehire a SCLC aide he had fired for unsavory political connections.

The agent was so impressed with King's obvious dominance that he taped the conversation and took it home, and played it for his agent friends.

"This guy was an ex-football player with no real politics," a friend of his said. "He said, 'I'd always thought that King was just a dumb nigger, couldn't write a speech, couldn't make up his own mind. But he stood fast on all counts!'" His friend added, "The ball player's racism was so pervasive that he couldn't conceive of an intellectual being black. He wouldn't listen to his speeches. He shut them off when King was on the radio."

Of course, agents had to attend King's speeches; his movements were covered at all times. "But they wouldn't listen to the speeches; they thought they'd been written by someone else," said Arthur Murtaugh.

Lively debate ensued between those agents willing to discuss Dr. King. Murtaugh said, "One of the agents and I had a sparring match about King's alleged flirtation with Communism and what it meant, and the agent felt, at first, that King was some kind of a devil. There was a code name for King—Zorro." Zorro, the Spanish word for fox, was a legendary hero in the Spanish Old West, popularized by a television program of the late fifties; a nobleman in disguise, he was a political Robin Hood.

"Zorro" was followed and spied upon constantly, and concerted efforts were made to humiliate King. Murtaugh related how his own doctor had been involved:

The wiretap had been on for a long time. King had been awarded the Nobel Prize, and a banquet was planned for King, to be in Atlanta, to which world dignitaries would be invited, thousands of people. It would be a testimonial.

Bill Sullivan, an Assistant Director of the Bureau, from Hoover's office, came into the Atlanta office and called a field conference for security. I never heard of a field conference for security. The Bureau always has the agents go back to the Bureau—even from the West Coast. They don't send Assistant Directors out to the field—they bring the troops in.

So they were coming to Atlanta to have a field conference on security, and they had one. But none of the security agents met Sullivan. There was no meeting. There was no discussion.

I walked into the squad room in the morning and the agent came out of the meeting room and said, "They're going to get Zorro now! Sullivan's in there and we're really going to get him!"

Sullivan was in there with the supervisor we called Col Klink, which was the best characterization we could give when he came out, because he was so much a Colonel Klink couldn't resist telling me how he was hobnobbing with the shots. "I'm going out with Sullivan," he said. "We're gonna King this time."

I went out, and went about my work, and came back in, Klink was back, saying, "We really laid it on."

Klink told Murtaugh that he hadn't gone in with Sullivan to see F McGill, editor of the Atlanta Constitution, a highly respected newspaper but that Sullivan had been "closeted with McGill for an hour and a half."

"I don't think you'll find McGill giving King any favorable comment from now on," said "Klink" to Murtaugh.

A week later, Murtaugh went to see his doctor. The doctor said, "Art, I'm glad you came in. I wanted to ask you something."

The doctor had accompanied the Archbishop of Atlanta to the can II conference in Rome because the Archbishop was very ill. He soon after at the age of forty-nine.

The doctor told Murtaugh, "I went in to see the Archbishop a few days ago, and he was in bed, and he asked me why two FBI men from Washington would come to see him, and try to dissuade him from making a speech—the main testimonial speech for Dr. King, at the banquet."

The doctor said that he didn't know why, and the Archbishop told him that there was going to be an exposé of King that would embarrass the Church if they had anything to do with him. He had to pull out and support King.

"Also," Murtaugh continued, "the chief rabbi of Atlanta called the Archbishop, and said that two men from the Bureau in Washington came to see him."

The Archbishop responded, "I respect Dr. King's public position, and I think he is a great leader in that area, and I intend to go along with the speech."

Murtaugh supposed that Sullivan and Colonel Klink told prominent citizens and the press that they had something devastating on their minds—something, perhaps, from the wiretap. "I think they were caught—something. Divulging the material would be a crime. They probably made some implications."

Although Murtaugh was assigned to the King investigation, he did not work on the wiretap. "I told Klink I wouldn't do it. I thought the whole thing was illegal. And I knew the bastards were using it illegally."

time King was in a house and they called the fire department on him. Reported a fire in the house, to harass him. All child's play. They mailed him things—a tape to his wife.

“The tape was mailed from the Atlanta office, but the letter suggesting that he commit suicide came from the Bureau.” That letter was mailed from Florida.

The bugging of King was so constant that his hotel rooms were bugged in Sweden when he went to collect the Nobel Prize.”

PART FOUR

PRELUDE TO MURDER

Chapter Fifteen

MARCH 28, MEMPHIS

by Mark Lane

In March 1968, Martin Luther King was stepping up his activities in preparation for the Poor People's March, which was to begin April 29. The plan was to amass a multiracial army of the poor to "stay-in" the nation's capital until "human dignity" concessions were wrenched from a government then pouring billions of dollars into the Vietnam War. King's daring plan was attacked strongly by black moderates, including Bayard Rustin and Roy Wilkins. It marked a shift from civil rights to economic issues. It was this same shift in politics that brought King, somewhat reluctantly, to Memphis. Although he had wanted to devote all of his time to building a successful Poor People's March, King's new politics would not allow him to ignore the call for help from a nascent union of mostly black sanitation workers in Memphis. The workers were on strike for union recognition, an end to racial discrimination on the job, and better wages and working conditions. The strikers had gained the united and militant support of the entire black community and a handful of white sympathizers.

King's help was requested by SCLC member Reverend James Lawson, the leader of the Memphis Strike Strategy Committee. A plan was formulated—King would send in aides James Bevel, James Orange, Tyrone Brooks, Andy Young, and Hosea Williams to prepare a massive march in Memphis which would draw national attention to the strike. King's aides recruited the help of an organized militant black group, the Invaders. This group had repeatedly brought hundreds of black students to earlier marches. The Invaders were helpful at times, provocative at others.

On the day of the March 28 demonstration, a crowd of 8,000 people, spanning many blocks, awaited Dr. King's arrival. Reverend Lawson noticed many marchers he had never seen at strike sessions or civil rights demonstrations directly at the front of the march.

Shortly after the march began, the first windows were broken. In some areas, looting began before the marchers entered the area. According to eyewitness reports, police just watched this looting and did nothing to stop it until the marchers came through.

Soon the police entered, viciously and indiscriminately attacking the demonstrators. Dr. King's party commandeered a passing car and was taken by a police escort to the Holiday Inn Rivermont Hotel.

At a press conference the next day, King vowed to return to show that his tactics of mass nonviolent action were still viable. The violence in Memphis gave black Establishment spokesmen more ammunition with which to attack King's Poor People's March. The day before King was killed, NAACP executive director Roy Wilkins scored King in a story in the Memphis Press-Scimitar, saying he doubted that the SCLC leader could keep the Washington march nonviolent. "If a maverick at the rear ranks of the march decides to throw a brick through a window, there's nothing Dr. King up front can do to stop it."

The official explanation of the Memphis march-turned riot is that the violence and looting were probably triggered by the Invaders. But a black reporter for Newsday, Les Payne, has turned up evidence which adds a new dimension to the matter.

In an article entitled, "FBI Tied to King's Return to Memphis", Payne reached his conclusion in three steps:

- 1) Several FBI informants and at least one Memphis police undercover agent were among the most active members of the Invaders.
- 2) According to some witnesses, the Invaders led the March 28 riots which attempted to discredit King.

- 3) According to Jesse Jackson and Andrew Young, 'Dr. King would never have returned to Memphis if the violence had not happened.'

This seemingly farfetched thesis must be considered seriously when viewed in the context of the FBI's campaign to destroy Dr. King and their COINTELPRO (Counter Intelligence Program) tactics to provoke and disrupt black groups. One FBI memo admitted the use of agents provocateurs "... in harassing and impelling criminal activities. . . ." During the late sixties, FBI provocateurs in the black movement repeatedly urged and initiated violent acts. In the Memphis setting, turning a nonviolent march into a riot would have furthered the FBI's goal of discrediting King.

In his Newsday article, Payne wrote, "One of the informants [in the Invaders] reportedly planned a large portion of the group's violent confrontations." The undercover policeman, who is still a member of the Memphis force, was at the scene of the violence on the day of the riot. He was a very active and vocal member of the group. A former leader of the Invaders told Payne:

He had a 7.62 Russian automatic rifle and he was armed every time we were armed. He was always suggesting actions that we should take; I never saw him physically attack anyone. But he was one of the most provocative members of the Invaders.

The group was apparently so well penetrated that, according to Payne, "Police and FBI officials were regularly provided with detailed information about the group's plans, activities and meetings." A source went on to tell him, "They knew what went on at Invaders' meetings. It was as if they had a tape recorder there."

Detective Ed Redditt, a member of the Memphis Police Department in 1968, described another agent provocateur within the Invaders in a conversation with me last year:

He left the police department . . . and the word was that he went to Washington, D.C. Then a couple of years after the King slaying I ran face to face with him in downtown Memphis. He was wearing a disguise.

When Redditt stopped and confronted the man, the former infiltrator pretended to be someone else, but finally acknowledged his true identity. "He acted very mysterious, saying that he was now with the Central Intelligence Agency, and begged me not to blow his cover." Redditt told me.

The infiltration of the Invaders touched directly on Dr. King. According to Payne, the undercover agent who carried around the automatic rifle was also part of an Invaders security detail for King. This detail left the Lorraine Motel—for unexplained reasons—just thirty minutes before King was killed.

As the head of the strike strategy committee, Rev James Lawson tried to work with the Invaders during and after the strike. It was not always easy.

Lawson spent most of a 2½ hour interview with Jeff Cohen, an able investigator residing in Los Angeles, discussing the now-defunct group. "From the beginning, I said publicly at mass meetings that I thought the Invaders were provocateurs."

Reverend Lawson invited an Invader representative to join the broad-based strategy committee. The committee had to deal with the survival needs of the strikers and their families, plus the boycott of downtown merchants, daily marches, and tactical issues. Lawson said, "The Invaders made it difficult for us to do the work that was on top of us. They wanted to rearrange the agenda to make room for their rhetoric. It seemed like they wanted to create havoc." He continued:

At a time when we were strong and dynamic, when the strike was freezing up the downtown area, when our boycott was 97 percent effective, according to Business Week, when the business community was putting pressure on the mayor to settle, when our weaponry was obviously effective, why then would you want to change strategy? It would be another story if your weapons weren't working. Why would these guys come around at public meetings, yelling about burning down and killing honkies? They talked nonsense.

Lawson remembered that on March 28 he confronted a man described as a "Beale Street crook," haranguing the crowd to remove the posters from the sticks and use them as spears.

Immediately after the riot, Reverend Lawson launched an investigation into who was behind the violence. After studying photographs and conducting interviews, he concluded that much of the violence was instigated by known Beale Street muggers and crooks. "They may or may not have been paid provocateurs, but they are all not Invaders," he told Cohen.

Lawson takes the issue of FBI provocation of the Invaders and others very seriously. He still wonders about a threat he received in the mail.

A few days after Martin's death, I received a package in the mail that had my picture and a bullet taped to it. It read something like, "We've got one for you too, nigger-preacher." Although I showed it to no one but my wife, I soon got a call from (Memphis Police Director) Holloman on some matter and he said, "I understand you got a package." That's when, for some reason, I was convinced it came from the Invaders and that the FBI was in on it. It's funny, I didn't suspect the Memphis police. Probably because Holloman worked for the FBI for so many years.

One of the leaders of the Invaders, John B. Smith, told Jeff Cohen that:

The marching contingent, not the leadership, could have been infiltrated. They were mostly eighteen- and nineteen-year olds. It's very possible that the FBI hired people to throw rocks and bricks. It's also possible that a paid provocateur would have then proclaimed, "I'm an Invader." Remember too, if someone got up and spoke loudly at a meeting, that didn't mean that they were part of the leadership.

Smith disagreed with Payne's statement that the Invaders provided a four-man security force for Dr. King, but he offered an explanation:

We provided no security for King at the Lorraine. There was a heavy-set, brown-skinned, baldheaded guy named Barracuda, who along with three or four others, played a security role. They were probably not from Memphis. At least I hadn't seen them before . . . or since. They wore cutoff Levi jackets and could easily have been mistaken for Invaders.

The confusion about the Levi-jacketed security detail parallels the situation in certain places where anyone who wore a black leather jacket was considered a member of the Black Panther Party.

While Smith contests some of Payne's specifics in his defense of the Invaders' leadership, he would be surprised if the FBI did not provoke violence to discredit King. "Knowing how they tried to destroy Dr. King, I'd be shocked if they did not have a hand in it. But the premise that the FBI had to go through the Invaders' leadership to hurt King is wrong."

In an account published by the black-oriented Tri-State Defender, Coby Smith, formerly a senior member and adviser to the Invaders, and now an administrator at State Tech Institute, called the Newspaper article "not completely accurate." Coby Smith claims that he and other Invaders were aware of infiltrators in the organization long before King's death. He said that although the Invaders decided not to take part in the march, many people were donning Invader jackets because "they were very easy to make." His comments agree with John B. Smith's that there were people posing as Invaders who could have provoked the march to violence.

The FBI's role in Memphis just prior to the assassination is a huge and ominous question mark. Most Americans believe that the FBI investigates crimes. But revelations about the COMTELPRO operation indicate that the FBI has been committing them. Perhaps the House Committee on Assassinations can clarify the issue.

Dr. King's nonviolent movement in Memphis had been jeopardized by a series of events, culminating in the massive use of weapons, tear gas, clubs, and mace by the police under the direction of Frank Holloman, against the marching black population of Memphis. The fact that some of the violence was initiated, or at the least was said to have been initiated by some of the demonstrators, created a crisis for King's movement. He had little choice. It appeared that he was constrained to return to Memphis, to preach nonviolence yet again and to carry off a successful demonstration as witness to his deeply-held beliefs.

King was under fire from almost all of the traditional national black leaders for having called for an end to the war in Vietnam. The federal police had weakened his movement through numerous illegal efforts that enjoyed uneven success. FBI-infiltrated groups of young "militants" condemned him for his adherence to nonviolence in the face of continued and unabated violence directed against him and those who marched with him.

Liberal publications and friends who had formerly supported him had turned against him. Andrew Young, a black minister who had served in the Southern Christian Leadership Conference with King, now the United States Ambassador to the United Nations, told the Church Committee:

It was a great burden to be attacked by people he respected, particularly when the attacks engendered by the FBI came from people like Ralph McGill. He sat down and cried at the New York Times editorial about his statement on Vietnam, but this just made him more determined. It was a great personal suffering, but since we don't really know all that they did, we have no way of knowing the ways that they affected us.

If a meaningful and nonviolent march to Washington on April 22, 1968 appeared to be crucial to Dr. King, it seemed on March 28 that a similar action in Memphis was required as a precursor.

On March 29 the local press in Memphis removed any doubt. On that day the Memphis Commercial Clarion stated:

Yesterday's march, ostensibly a protest on behalf of the city's striking sanitation workers, was generally considered to be a "dress rehearsal" by Dr. King for his planned march on Washington April 22.

The Domestic Intelligence Division of the FBI, in a memorandum circulated the previous day, stated:

A sanitation strike has been going on in Memphis for some time. Martin Luther King, Jr., today led a march composed of 5,000 to 6,000 people through the streets of Memphis. King was in an automobile preceding the marchers. As the march developed, acts of violence and vandalism broke out including the breaking of windows in stores and some looting.

This clearly demonstrates that acts of so-called nonviolence advocated by King cannot be controlled. The same thing could happen in his planned massive civil disobedience for Washington in April.

The memorandum was accompanied by an "action" directive which read:

ACTION

Attached is a blind memorandum pointing out the above, which if you approve, should be made available by Crime Records Division to cooperative news media sources.

The memorandum was initiated by Hoover and carried his approval in the form of the "O.K." written by him. On the memorandum the notation, "handled on 3/28/68" was evidence that the suggestion had been given to "cooperative news media sources."

The Memphis Commercial Clarion was the first news media to publish an article that resembled the memorandum written by FBI agents. The Memphis Commercial Appeal the next day picked up the "dress rehearsal" phrase and reported:

Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., came to Memphis to star in what was billed as a "dress rehearsal" for his April 22 "Poor People's Crusade" on Washington. By his own nonviolent standards, the rehearsal was a flop.

The article then presented the other point that had been made by the FBI news writers. "The question being asked in Memphis, the nation and the world is whether—with the increasing militancy of the black youth—anyone can say with certainty that a nonviolent demonstration will stay that way."

That same day The New York Times published an editorial entitled "Mini-Riot in Memphis . . ." which made the same point:

The disorder in Memphis that left store windows on Beale Street smashed and one Negro youth dead exposes the danger in drawing large numbers of protesters into the streets for emotional demonstrations in this time of civic unrest. The Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King, who organized the Memphis march, is organizing a "Poor People's Campaign" for Washington, D. C., next month. None of the precautions he and his aides are taking to keep the capital demonstration peaceful can provide any dependable insurance against another eruption of the kind that rocked Memphis.

Chapter Sixteen

MARCH 29, MEMPHIS AND WASHINGTON

by Mark Lane

On March 29 the Domestic Intelligence Division of the FBI drafted another "news story" and recommended that that article should also be furnished to cooperative news sources. It read:

Martin Luther King, during the sanitation workers' strike in Memphis, Tennessee, has urged Negroes to boycott downtown white merchants to achieve Negro demands. On 3/29/68 King led a march for the sanitation workers. Like Judas leading lambs to slaughter, King led the marchers to violence, and when the violence broke out, King disappeared.

The fine Hotel Lorraine in Memphis is owned and patronized exclusively by Negroes, but King didn't go there for his hasty exit. Instead, King decided the plush Holiday Inn Motel, white owned, operated and almost exclusively patronized, was the place to "cool it." There will be no boycott of white merchants for King, only for his followers.

The FBI agents even provided a headline for the story: "Do As I Say, Not As I Do." The news story was accompanied by an internal Bureau memorandum, bearing the caption of its Counterintelligence Program, which read as follows:

The purpose is to publicize hypocrisy on the part of Martin Luther King. Background: Martin Luther King has urged Negroes in Memphis, Tenn., to boycott white merchants in order to force compliance with Negro demands in the sanitation workers' strike in Memphis. On March 28, 1968, King disappeared. There is a first-class Negro hotel in Memphis, the Hotel Lorraine, but King chose to hide out at the white-owned and operated Holiday Inn Motel.

Recommendation: The above facts have been included in the attached blind memorandum, and it is recommended it be furnished to a cooperative news media source by the Crimes Records Division for items showing King is a hypocrite. This will be done on a highly confidential basis.

That document bore Hoover's approval as well. He wrote on it "O.K., H" which indicated his approval of the plan.

When the Church Committee examined the document they reported that the notation "handled" appeared on the document, but that the date next to the word "handled" was illegible on the copy of the document furnished to the Senate Committee by the FBI and that "we have not yet seen the original document."

Since the FBI maintained that the date of handling was April 3, 1968, the FBI was also able to maintain that its program was not put into effect in this instance. Dr. King arrived in Memphis on April 3. Yet the blurred date, the refusal of the FBI to furnish a clear copy or the original document, and the history of FBI officials in hastily putting programs against Dr. King into action immediately after they were approved by Hoover for fear of Hoover's wrath if they failed to do so, raises serious questions. The Church Committee, however, did not confront those questions.

Instead of closely questioning the FBI agent who wrote "handled" on the memorandum, in an effort to determine how he had acquitted himself of his responsibility to furnish the article to a "cooperative news media source" on "a highly confidential basis" before he wrote the note signifying that he had done so, the Church Committee asked the FBI to investigate. The Committee then reported, "The FBI questioned the agent who wrote 'handled' on the memorandum and informed the Committee that he did not recall the memorandum, and did not know whether 'handled' indicated that he had disseminated the article or simply cleared the memorandum through the Crime Records Division of the FBI." Since in intelligence jargon "handled" means that the job has been done, the doubt suggested by the FBI investigation as to what "handled" meant in this instance hardly seems justified. It also appears rather unlikely that an FBI agent who may have played an important part in moving Dr. King from the relative safety of the imposing and isolated Rivermont Holiday Inn to a very vulnerable location at which he was, in fact, killed the next day would "not recall" the incident or his own actions relevant to it.

Perhaps the best evidence presently available regarding the action taken by the FBI in reference to the promulgation of its own news article can be gleaned by an examination of the news media reports. For, in this instance, the proof of the plotting is in the reading.

The day after the agent noted that the matter had been "handled," the Memphis newspapers began referring to Dr. King's "posh" room at the Rivermont Holiday Inn. In an article the Memphis Commercial Appeal even disclosed the exact cost of the room, referring to it as "Dr. King's $29-a-day room at the Holiday Inn Rivermont."

The Memphis police reporters in contact with Frank Holloman began to speak of King's betrayal as evidenced by his "posh" accommodations at the Rivermont. The political reporters in contact with the Mayor made similar observations. According to Kay Pittman Black, a reporter for the Memphis Press-Scimitar, "there was even resentment in the Invader group about him staying at this fancy hotel." Ms. Black had covered all aspects of the sanitation strike and the visits to the city that Dr. King had made. The Church Committee offered the conclusion that "Dr. King always stayed at the Lorraine when he visited Memphis; with the exception of his prior visit". That conclusion, however, was not based upon an investigation by the Committee, but upon its acceptance of the assertion of the FBI and of one other person. Clearly, a cursory examination of hotel registration records might have revealed the facts.

When Ms. Black was told that it was alleged that Dr. King had always stayed at the Lorraine in the past she said, "No. He did not. I covered his every visit to this city—even before the strike. He stayed at the Claridge, the big hotel downtown, right across from City Hall. The SCLC and Dr. King had almost an entire floor there. They had never stayed at the Lorraine. Not that I know of. In fact when I was told, I guess it was on April 3, that he was to be at the Lorraine, I was at the AME building. I spent a great deal of time there and it was my specific duty to keep up with Dr. King, to know when he was to arrive, to know where he was staying."

Ms. Black said that the coordinator of the sanitation workers' strike told her that King "would not be at the Rivermont—that he would be staying at the Lorraine as a commitment to patronize small black-owned businesses, as opposed to staying at a white-owned hotel". Ms. Black added, "I know it was the first time that I ever heard of Dr. King being at the Lorraine Motel because, at that time, I didn't even know where that hotel was. I knew, I guess, that it was generally in the black area, but I didn't actually know where it was located. I went over there in the morning and I sat in the coffee shop and talked to Andy Young and Jim Bevel and Jesse Jackson. And that was the first time I saw the Lorraine Motel and I followed Dr. King closely whenever he was in Memphis."

The FBI memoranda had accomplished their tasks. Dr. King had returned to Memphis to lead a nonviolent march for the sanitation workers and to salvage his national movement and his projected Poor People's Crusade. He was compelled to do so, at least partially due to the FBI memorandum of March 28 and the wide circulation given to that memorandum, at first in Memphis, and then throughout the country.

Senator Robert C. Byrd led the efforts in Congress to condemn Dr. King and said that he should be enjoined from carrying out the planned demonstration in Washington. He referred to Dr. King as a "self-seeking rabble-rouser" and predicted that King, if not stopped, would be responsible for "violence, destruction, looting and bloodshed" in Washington.

Approximately seven years later the origin of Senator Byrd's vehement attack upon Dr. King became evident as the Church Committee secured access to various FBI memoranda. On January 19, 1968, Cartha De Loach, then a high-ranking FBI official, reported to Hoover's personal friend and FBI colleague, Clyde Tolson, that he had met with Senator Byrd. According to the De Loach memorandum, Byrd had expressed concern over Dr. King's plan for demonstrations in Washington and said that it was time that "King met his Waterloo." De Loach's memorandum states that Byrd asked if the FBI would prepare a speech about Dr. King which he could deliver on the floor of the Senate.

The speech, which was delivered on March 29, 1968, by Senator Byrd, now the leader of the Democratic Party in the Senate, was vehement. Although Dr. King was the victim of the violence, Byrd said:

Yesterday, Mr. President, the nation was given a preview of what may be in store for this city by the outrageous and despicable riot that Martin Luther King helped to bring about in Memphis, Tennessee.

He continued:

In Memphis, people were injured, stores were looted, property was destroyed, terror reigned in the streets, people were beaten by hoodlums, at least one Negro youth is known to have been killed, and massive rioting erupted during a march which was led by this man. It was a shameful and totally uncalled for outburst of lawlessness undoubtedly encouraged to some considerable degree, at least, by his words and actions, and his presence.

There is no reason for us to believe that the same destructive rioting and violence cannot, or that it will not, happen here if King attempts his so-called Poor People's March, for what he plans in Washington appears to be something on a far greater scale than what he had indicated he planned to do in Memphis.

Almost all who admired Dr. King as well as those who despised him or were indifferent to his work agreed that he was a man of great personal courage. From his upholstered chair in what its members are pleased to refer to as the most exclusive club in the world, Byrd attacked Dr. King's commitment and questioned his courage.

When the predictable rioting erupted in Tennessee, Martin Luther King fled the scene. He took to his heels and disappeared, leaving it to others to cope with the destructive forces he had helped to unleash.

Returning to his theme of Dr. King's "flight" from danger again and again, Byrd said:

King intends to create a black hole of despair with people packed together with pigs and chickens in a "shanty town" lacking sanitation. Surely he must know that to change hearts it is not necessary to turn stomachs. It can be assumed that, however, if yesterday's flight by King from the disorder he had helped to generate was any indication of what he might do here, the "Messiah" himself will not share the squalor he plans and that instead he will be conducting a lay-in at a posh Washington hotel to dramatize some imaginary discrimination there.

Had the speech been prepared on Hoover's private stationery, the clues regarding its conception would have been little more apparent. The word "Messiah" figured prominently in FBI jargon regarding Dr. King. A high-level FBI memorandum suggested that the FBI create its own black "messiah" to replace Dr. King. The allegation that Dr. King would conduct a "lay-in" at a Washington hotel might be construed as a reference to the then still secret war against Dr. King waged through FBI espionage tactics.

The reference to the "posh Washington hotel" may have been a device calculated by the FBI to embarrass Dr. King and drive him from the Holiday Inn Rivermont Hotel into the more modest Lorraine. If so, the United States Senate was employed, along with the local newspapers in Memphis, in an effort to move Dr. King to the location at which he was ultimately murdered. Byrd charged that "King lovingly breaks the law like a boa constrictor." He continued, Apparently the hoodlums in Memphis yesterday followed King's advice to break laws with which they did not agree. This has been a cardinal principle of his philosophy—a philosophy that leads naturally to the escalation of nonviolence into civil disobedience—which is only a euphemism for lawbreaking and criminality and which escalates next into civil unrest, civil disorder, and insurrection.

Mr. President, I have previously urged, in discussing this matter with the Justice Department, that the Federal Government seek a court order to enjoin Martin Luther King and his pulpitiess parsons from carrying out their planned poor people's campaign in the Nation's Capital. In the light of yesterday's bloody chapter of violence which erupted with the visit of Martin Luther King to Memphis, I again urge that the Federal Government take steps to prevent King from carrying out his planned harassment of Washington, D. C. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. It is time for our Federal Government—which in recent years has shown itself to be virtually spineless when it comes to standing up against the lawbreakers, the hoodlums, and the Marxist demonstrators—at least to let the Nation know, in no uncertain terms, that it will not allow this Nobel Peace Prize winner to create another Memphis in the city which serves as the seat of the Government of the United States.

Byrd was joined by other Senators and Representatives who, no doubt, without understanding that they were doing so, followed closely the script that the FBI had prepared just the day before. Among those who focused upon the Memphis riot to demand executive action to bar the demonstration were Senators Strom Thurmond, John Stennis, and various members of the House. Among those who "saw the possibility of violence" in Washington and who opposed Dr. King's march were Senator Edward W. Brooke, described by the media as "the nation's highest Negro office holder," and Senator Howard Baker, who said that "the March on Washington is like striking a match to look in your gas tank and see if you're out of gas."

Senator Strom Thurmond echoed Byrd's remarks and then revealed that he too may have been privy to an FBI briefing or two.

... I call upon President Johnson to make public the information about King which is available to him. This information is openly talked about in Washington. References to it have appeared in the newspapers. I challenge the administration to let all the citizens of this country know what kind of a man King really is, and what his true purpose is.

The campaign of vilification of Dr. King raged on unabated in the Senate, far from the slums of Memphis where children of sanitation workers suffered from malnutrition, were ill clothed, and attended substandard schools.

Senator Stennis had a word of advice for those and other "colored" people:

I want to give a word of advice and counsel to the colored people and to any others who may be inclined to come to Washington from Mississippi. It is to stay out of the march. Nothing good for them or from anyone else can come from it. They run the risk that harm can come from it. They run the risk that harm can come to any individual or any group. I mean by that the possibility of personal injury and violence in the course of any demonstrations that may get out of hand.

Dr. King returned to Memphis. The riot required that he return to confront yet again the twin evils of economic and racial discrimination.

The FBI had prevailed. Dr. King was to return not just to Memphis but to the Lorraine Motel.

Chapter Seventeen

APRIL 3 AND 4, MEMPHIS

by Dick Gregory

Reading Martin Luther King's final message to America and reflecting on his last day of life was a profoundly emotional experience for me. As I re-read it and listened to it so many times on tape, the feeling recurs, that King betrayed in his comments a premonition of the vicious experience creeping up on him. The tone and content of the message suggests that he believed his life might end soon.

I try to reconstruct in my own mind how he may have been feeling that night in Mason Temple in Memphis. Was he sad, weary, but determined to fight on to the end? Was he lonely, misunderstood but still unwavering in his convictions? I wonder what went through his mind as he stood there, knowing the stark hatred many aimed at him and his cause. And I wonder if his thoughts were with his family; those I had met, his brother, A. D., his mother, Alberta, his father, Daddy King, his children, and Coretta; and those I didn't know.

And I listen again to the touching segment of his speech in which he drew an analogy between his reasons for being in Memphis and the Bible parable of the Good Samaritan.

King related how he and Coretta were in Jerusalem where they rented a car to Jericho, taking the same road traveled by the Good Samaritan and the victim of highway robbery that he befriended. As they drove along the ancient road King said he saw the application of the parable to contemporary American life.

I was struck by King's keen perception of the lesson of the parable. The question, he said, must be what will happen to my brother if I don't stop to help him—not what will happen to me, what will I lose, if I do help him. He posed the question to his audience, told them that his position was not what might he lose if he joined the sanitation workers in their dispute, but rather what terrible consequences might result if he failed to help them.

If Martin could return and sit down with me, there are a million things

I'd want to say to him. But, if the time were very short and I had to choose one topic, it would be this:

Martin, I want you to know how grateful I am that you stopped that you encountered a sick, mortally wounded society as you traveled the road of life and you refused to ignore it; that you offered a helping hand. Thank you for stopping in Memphis, Birmingham, in Selma and St. Augustine, in Cleveland, Ohio, and Chicago. You stopped, you interrupted your life to speak out against the War in Vietnam.

"Thank you, Martin," I would go on, for ensuring that we need never ask the tragic question that too often follows neglect of duty: "Would this have happened if . . ." Because of you, we don't have to go to the back of Birmingham's buses, we don't have to say "If Martin had stopped here, the buses and the schools and the stores and the restaurants would be desegregated now," because you came and they are. We don't have to say "If Martin Luther King had stopped to help with voter registration there would be more black voters in the country," because you did stop and there are.

Because of you, Martin, I can give thanks that I, as an American and human being, will never have to pose that question. Because you stopped, a thousand potential tragedies were eliminated before they could be set in motion. I'm glad I don't have to say, "If only King had been there, this might not have happened," because you were there, and it didn't happen.

I reflect on your final message and know it is one from which unborn generations will derive meaning and inspiration. How I wish I could have been in the audience that last night of your life. I wish I could have been there to listen as you delivered your talk, to watch as you touched your face with your finger in a characteristic gesture, as you moved your shoulders to make sure your coat hung properly. I'm sorry I missed your smile as your eyes swept the crowded auditorium, as you recognized so many of the folks and welcomed the ones who listened to you for the first time.

I wish I had been there to hear the following brilliant farewell message, although none of your listeners knew it was goodbye.

Dr. Martin Luther King's, final words to America were spoken at Mason Temple, Memphis, Tennessee, on April 3, 1968. The next day he was murdered, but his vision for a humane world order will never die. Excerpts from his address follows.

A VIEW FROM THE MOUNTAINTOP

If I was standing at the beginning of time with the pulse of energy ticking, a kind of general with panoramic view of the whole of human history up to now, and the Almighty said to me, Martin Luther King, which age would you like to live in? I would take my mental flight by Egypt. And I would watch God's children in their magnificent trek from the dark dungeons of Egypt; across the Red Sea; through the wilderness; on toward the Promised Land, and in spite of its magnificence, I wouldn't stop there.

I would move on by Greece and take my mind to Mount Olympus. I would see Plato, Aristotle, Socrates, Euripides and Aristophanes, assembled around the Parthenon. And I would watch them around the Parthenon, as they discuss the great and eternal issues of reality, but I wouldn't stop there.

I would go on even to the great heyday of the Roman Empire. And I would see developments through various emperors and leaders. But I wouldn't stop there.

I would even come to the day of the Renaissance, and get a good picture of all that the Renaissance did for the cultural and aesthetic life of man, but I wouldn't stop there. I would even go by the way that the man for whom I am named had his habitat. And I would watch Martin Luther as he tacks his 95 theses on the door of the church of Wittenberg, but I wouldn't stop there.

I would come on up even to 1863 and watch the vacillating President by the name of Abraham Lincoln finally come to the conclusion that he had to sign the Emancipation Proclamation. But I wouldn't stop there. I would even come up to the early thirties, and see a man grappling with the problems of the bankruptcy of this nation. And come with an eloquent cry that we have nothing to fear but fear itself. But I wouldn't stop there.

Strangely enough, I would turn to the Almighty and say, "If you allow me to live just a few years in the second half of the twentieth century, I will be happy." Now that's a strange statement to make because the world is all messed up, the nation is sick, trouble is in the land, confusion all around . . . that's a strange statement. But I know somehow that only when it is dark enough can you see the stars. And I see God working in this period of the twentieth century in a way that men in some strange way are responding. Something is happening in our world. The masses of people are rising up, whether they are in Johannesburg, South Africa, Nairobi, Kenya, Ghana, New York City, Atlanta, Georgia, Jackson, Mississippi, or Memphis, Tennessee, the cry is always the same: We want to be free.

I'm happy to live in this period in which we're going to grapple with the problems that men have been trying to grapple with through history, but, the demand didn't stop to do it. Survival demands that we grapple with them. Years now have been talking about war and peace. But no longer can they just talk about it. It is no longer a choice of violence and nonviolence in this world. It's nonviolence or justice. That is where we are today.

Now, I'm just happy that God has allowed me to live a period, to see what is unfolding. And I'm happy that he's come to be in Memphis. . . .

We've got to go on in Memphis. . . . I call upon you with us when we go out Monday. We'll have an injunction we'll go on into court tomorrow morning to fight this unconstitutional injunction. All we say to "massa" is be what you said on paper. If I lived in China, or even Russia, any totalitarian country, maybe I could understand some illegal injunctions. Maybe I could understand the denial of basic First Amendment privileges, because they have committed themselves to that over there. But somewhere I read of freedom of assembly; somewhere I read of the freedom of the press; somewhere I read of the greatness of America is the right to protest for right.

This is what we have to do. Always anchor our direction with the power of economic control. Now we're people. Individually we're poor, when you compare us to white society in America. We're poor. But collectively means all of us together, collectively we are richer than the nations in the world. Did you ever think about that?

That's power right there if we know how to pool it. We have to argue with anybody. We don't need any brickbats; we don't need any molotov cocktails. We just need around to these stores and massive industries in our country, "God sent us by here, to say to you that you're not in his children's right. And we come by here to ask you to make your first item on your agenda fair treatment where God's children are concerned. Now if you are not prepared to do that we have an agenda that we must follow. And our agenda calls for withdrawing economic support from you." Up to now, o garbage men have been feeling pain. Now we must kind of redistribute the pain. . . .

I remember when Mrs. King and I were in Jerusalem. We rented a car to go from Jerusalem down to Jericho. And as soon as we got on that road, I said to my wife, "I can see why Jesus used this as the setting for the parable of the Good Samaritan." It's a winding, meandering road. It's really conducive for ambushing. You start out in Jerusalem which is about 1,200 feet above sea level. And by the time you get down to Jericho, 15 or 20 minutes later, you're about 2,200 feet below sea level. That's a dangerous road. In the days of Jesus it came to be known as the Bloody Pass.

And you know it's possible that the priest and the Levite looked over that man on the ground and wondered if the robbers were still around. It's possible that they felt the man on the ground was merely faking—acting like he had been robbed and beaten in order to lure them there for quick and easy seizure. And so the first question that the priest asked, the first question that the Levite asked was, "If I stop to help this man, what will happen to me?" But then the Good Samaritan came by. And he reversed the question. "If I do not stop to help this man, what will happen to him?" That's the question before you tonight. Not if I stop to help the sanitation workers what will happen to my job; not if I stop to help the sanitation workers what will happen to all of the hours that I usually spend in my office every day of every week as a pastor. The question is not if I stop to help this man in need, what will happen to me. The question is, if I do not stop to help the sanitation workers, what will happen to them. That's the question. . . .

It really doesn't matter what happens now. I left Atlanta this morning, and we got started on the plane, there was trouble. The pilot said, over the public address system, "We're sorry for the delay. But we have Dr. Martin Luther King on the plane and to be sure that all of the bags were checked and to be sure that nothing would be wrong on the plane, we had to check out everything carefully and we've had the plane protected and guarded all night." Then I got into Memphis and some began to say the threats or talk about the threats that were out, and what would happen to me from some of our sick white brothers.

Well, I don't know what will happen now. We've got some difficult days ahead, but it really doesn't matter with me now because I've been to the mountaintop. And I don't mind. Like anybody, I would like to live a long life. Longevity has its place. But I'm not concerned about that now. I just want to do God's will. And He has allowed me to go up to the mountain. And I've looked over, and I've seen the Promised Land. I may not get there with you, but I want you to know tonight that we as a people will get to the Promised Land. So I'm happy tonight. I'm not worried about anything. I'm not fearing any man. Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord.

April 4, 1968

Morning comes too quickly to suit the two tired men who sleep in the motel room. The night before both had participated in a long, emotion-charged rally. One was the main speaker and the other a kind of advance man.

One of them opens his eyes and realizes that the light coming through the window near the edge not covered by the heavy drapes is a sign of morning. It is indeed time to get up, and this, like many mornings, is one where both men would have liked to have been able to rest a while longer.

Ralph Abernathy sits up in his bed, and there is a creaking sound as he swings his feet over the edge of the bed to the floor. He sits there for a long moment, and then succumbs to the inevitable. Stretching and yawning at the same time, he rises.

Then he glances in the bed next to his and sees that his friend is still sound asleep. He would like so much not to have to wake him, but there's a lot of work that has to be done, and they could not sleep late.

"Michael," he says in a kind, quiet voice. "Michael, come on now, its time to get up." The response is prompt, though the voice is still heavy with sleep.

"Yes David," he replied without making any motions to get out of bed.

"It's time to get up now. . . . You know we can't win this nonviolent revolution in bed. It's time to rise and shine. The early bird gets the worm."

Michael is fully awake now, and though he really isn't ready to get up, he is alert and jovial.

"Aw, David," he teases, "you're still a farmer. I'm never gonna get that Alabama soil out of you!"

They tease back and forth, lightly and easily, in a familiar pattern. It is a typical beginning to an ordinary day. I talked with Ralph Abernathy at great length about his private relationship to Dr. King. I wanted to know more than the story of two men who were professional colleagues and who shared a philosophy that is unique in our violence prone society—the philosophy of nonviolence.

Among other things, I learned that King called Abernathy by his middle name, David; and that Ralph privately addressed King by his real name, which was Michael. (King was christened Michael Luther but when he was six years old his father changed both their names to Martin Luther.) It interests me that King's original given name was Michael. This name, historically, is as eminent as that of Martin Luther. Michael, the archangel, according to the Bible, will be a leader in the war between God and Satan. It seems to me that King fulfilled the name of Michael more than that of Martin Luther. The legal act of changing his name to Martin did not alter the destiny of Michael. For it was certainly King's perception that he was engaged in a battle between good and evil.

Ralph Abernathy's reflections to me about King added another dimension to the man many have viewed as a saint, savior, and humanitarian. Because of Ralph's love for King, he was able to reveal a type of personal warmth when he recalled important times that he had spent with him. The events that took place on April 4, 1968, prior to the moment when King was shot, were typical of the daily routine of these two men.

After getting up that morning, they each showered and shaved as they had to get ready for an important meeting where they would discuss the forthcoming Poor People's March on Washington. Getting organized was never a problem. Though Ralph was always the first to get up, he was frequently the last to get dressed because while King would be dressing, he would request Ralph to make phone calls and take notes for him. It was Ralph's job to make sure everything was done right, and on time. There was no man in whom King had greater confidence.

They held the meeting right at the hotel. They were meeting with the leaders of a local militant group called the Invaders. [REDACTED] A [REDACTED] march held the week earlier had been disrupted by [REDACTED] who had infiltrated the ranks of the peaceful marchers and began rioting when the group reached downtown Memphis. Police had intervened and the march had to be called off. Andy Young reported that the Invaders were asking the SCLC to pay them $50,000 and give them five automobiles [REDACTED]. Abernathy recalls vividly King's response.

"This movement will exclude any person or group who uses violence as a tactic, as a strategy, or as a way of life." King, says Abernathy, was adamant that SCLC would not pay blackmail to any person or group for any reason.

King and Abernathy had not eaten breakfast that morning before the meeting. Normally, their first meal was around noontime. They were both hungry after leaving the meeting and they decided to have lunch in their room. Each ordered fried cutfish and salad. When the waitress brought their meal to the room, Abernathy was annoyed that she had not gotten the order right. She had all the fish on one plate, along with two bowls of salad. Abernathy was about to send her back to get the order straight when King told him not to worry about it. Abernathy recalls King saying to him, "Leave her alone David, it doesn't matter. You and me can eat from the same plate."

The two men spent the afternoon with other SCLC members, making plans, mapping strategy. Reverend Samuel Kyles, a Memphis minister who was in charge of the garbage workers' boycott, was one of those who came. King's brother, A.D., had come from Lexington to participate in the boycott and rally. Abernathy remembers King teasing Jesse Jackson. "Look Jesse, you can't take that whole band out to Sam's house tonight." SCLC had been invited to Reverend Kyles' home for dinner before the scheduled rally. "Sam's wife can't feed the whole bunch. And you be sure to dress up a little tonight, OK Jesse? No blue jeans, alright?"

Abernathy was the next in line for the teasing that was going on. One of the ministers accused him of taking almost as long to introduce King at the rally the night before as it took King to give the main address.

King had spoken the night of April 3rd, and that address came to be known as the now famous "Mountaintop Speech". It had been cold and dreary in Memphis; there were even tornado warnings. King did not think that people would turn out to hear him because of the bad weather, so he requested Abernathy to go to the Mason Temple and speak in his place. "You go ahead and speak for me tonight," he told Ralph. "I'll stay here and relax." Abernathy asked Jesse Jackson to go with him that night, and when they arrived at the church they were amazed at the large number of television cameras and reporters who were waiting outside in the cold and the rain. Abernathy was surprised that such a large number of press people were there. He looked inside and saw that about three hundred people were inside the enormous church that could seat three thousand. It was at that point that he decided that King, not himself, should be there to speak. He quickly went to a telephone and called the hotel. King was hesitant at first, but realizing that all these people had come out despite the severe weather warnings, he told Ralph he would be there. The church was very near the hotel, and it was not long before King arrived.

After Abernathy's introduction, King came onstage. His opening words that night were, "I want everybody here to know that Ralph David Abernathy is the closest and dearest friend I have in the world!" He went on to give his historic address, but in Ralph Abernathy's gallery of memories, King's public acknowledgment of the devotion he felt for his chief lieutenant were the words that shone most brightly that night.

Abernathy was often described as King's "behind the scenes man," or "his assistant." It is only when I talked with Ralph and learned of their many private conversations did I realize how very much Ralph Abernathy meant to Martin Luther King.

"David," King would say, "I want you to know how much I appreciate your loyalty. I get all the attention from the press, but you're just as important to the movement as I am. I couldn't do my work if you were not here with me. Life is very arbitrary in choosing who will be idolized, who will be the leader. People often forget that a leader is no stronger than his foundation, the often invisible people who give him support. I'll never forget that David. The newspapermen, the cameramen, some of our own SCLC colleagues may forget it, but I want you to know that I never, never will forget it". Abernathy recalls that during King's words to him, he felt that King was looking for a way to repay Ralph for all the work he had done. But Ralph said he always replied this way; "I don't want anything more Michael, I just want to be here working with you. I'm pleased and satisfied about what I can do for you." Envy and jealousy were never present in the relationship between Ralph David Abernathy and Martin Luther King, Jr.

It is still April 4th, and King's mother Alberta King was elated at the fact that her two sons, Martin and A.D. were together this day, chatting, and sharing precious memories. King had gone to his brother's room at the hotel while Ralph rested in room 306. Around two thirty that afternoon, King rang Ralph in the room and told him how happy he was that his brother had come, and that they had just both spoken with their mother over the telephone. King always shared these kinds of personal joys with his friend Ralph.

Around five o'clock King and Abernathy prepared to leave the Lorraine Hotel for the dinner which was planned at Samuel Kyles' home. Abernathy, at King's direction, has phoned Mrs. Kyles and has been reassured that it is indeed a soul food feast that awaits the hungry SCLC corps. They were all hungry, and Kyles' wife, who they had all heard was a terrific cook had prepared a dinner that included roast beef, collard greens, chitterlings, black-eyed peas, cornbread, and fried chicken.

Kyles' wife also told Abernathy that the dinner would be at six o'clock, not at five o'clock as he had told them.

Confronted with this discrepancy, Kyles admits a little sheepishly, that he wanted to make sure they got there on time. Everyone, after all, was aware of "Colored Peoples' Time," meaning that blacks were notoriously late. Kyles said he simply wanted to insure that they would not be late for the special meal.

Now the two men are in room 306 alone. Both have changed clothes, and are freshening up. Both King and Abernathy splash on some Aramis after shave lotion. Abernathy told me that he remembered saying something about the lotion being a real necessity because King had just used a depilatory shave powder that fouled the air in the room. He said that the two of them often joked about the smell left by King's shaving solution.

King goes out to the balcony leading from the room. Jesse Jackson is on the ground below. They talk about the music to be played tonight. King turns to Jackson's companion, Ben Branch, an organizer from Chicago. "Be sure and play my favorite song tonight, okay?" Branch assures King that he will play the familiar tune "Precious Lord, Take My Hand".

Abernathy, meanwhile, continues to rub Aramis into his cheeks. He hears a noise, reminiscent of a firecracker popping. He looks to the balcony and sees King's knees collapse. "All I could see was his feet," said Abernathy as he recalled that fateful night. Abernathy immediately ran toward King and saw the blood as he lifted the head of his friend and looked into his eyes. Ralph believes that King did see and hear him that night. He recalls saying to King, "David, its going to be alright, don't you worry now because everything's going to be alright. I'll get help, don't worry. . . ."

All the rest has been recorded a thousand times. One thing sticks in Abernathy's mind though. It is Andy Young's voice saying; "It's over, it's over. . . ." Ralph told me that he kept telling Andy, "No, it's not over, it's not over."

It was Ralph Abernathy who stayed with King's body the rest of the night. It was Abernathy who stayed in the operating room though doctors and nurses had told him that he would have to leave. The world was shocked and the press was looking for Ralph Abernathy to talk about what had happened. But Ralph Abernathy never left the side of his friend's body that night. It was he who was called to the morgue to identify the body. "I remember something that hurt me more than anything else that night. . . . I remember going to that morgue and seeing my good friend with a brown paper tag hooked to his toe. I'll never forget that sight."

THE

Chapter Eighteen

APRIL 4, MEMPHIS

by Mark Lane

Directly across the street from the Lorraine Motel was a large rectangular building which served Memphis as Fire Station Two. From the rear of the building, which was built on an embankment, one was afforded a fine view of the Lorraine and, because it was raised high above the street, an almost eye-level view of the motel's second floor balcony. For some days the police, who were at best unsympathetic to their fellow city employees, most of whom were black, was exacerbated by the brutal attack the motel court and of most of the rooms which faced the fire station, and because it provided cover for the police. During the previous week, on March 28, a march from Clayborn Temple, led by Dr. King, was interrupted by window breaking. The police then moved into the demonstrators. Police attack dogs were replaced by the first mass use of mace in the nation against peaceful demonstrators. The police charged the marchers, using night sticks and tear gas, and firing weapons. A sixteen-year-old boy, Larry Payne, was shot and killed. Two hundred and eighty people were arrested and at least sixty were injured by police violence. The state legislature mandated a nightly curfew at 7 o'clock and 4,000 members of the National Guard moved into Memphis.

The feeling in the black community against the city officials who would not consider the minimal demands of the sanitation workers, and the police, who were at best unsympathetic to their fellow city employees, most of whom were black, was exacerbated by the brutal attack upon the demonstrators. The Invaders, a militant black youth group, demanded that the police be removed from the scene. Reverend Samuel Kyles asked the police to assign Ed Redditt, a black Memphis detective, to provide security for Dr. King. Redditt was assigned and set up the police command post at the firestation because of its proximity to the Lorraine and because it provided security from the invaders and others who wanted no police, black or white, on the scene.

A very interested observer in the police surveillance of the Lorraine Motel and Dr. King and his associates was Floyd Newsom, an intelligent articulate supporter of his fellow city employees. Floyd Newsom, a black fireman for the city of Memphis, was stationed at Fire Station Two. Newsom had marched with the sanitation workers. He had walked with and listened to Dr. King. He had been for many years an activist in the struggle for equal rights in Memphis. When I spoke to him recently he had just celebrated his forty-fourth birthday. His daughter lives at home; on son, who has a masters degree in art, teaches art at the University of Houston while his other son is completing work for his doctorate at the University of Michigan.

On April 3, 1968, Newsom saw Detective Redditt at the fire station. That evening Newsom went to the Mason Temple to hear Dr. King, who had just returned to Memphis. Newsom saw Redditt at the rally the evening as well. Then Dr. King spoke. Newsom was deeply moved by King's words and those words still haunted him as he returned to his home that Wednesday night. He entered his home at approximately 10:30 that evening and "I found a message to call into the Fire Department; to call my lieutenant, Lt. Smith." He called Smith who ordered him not to report to Station Two the next morning but insisted he report to Station Thirty one "on detail". A detail is a temporary transfer that is traditionally arranged so that a fire company with a surplus of men, or at least more personnel than are required for the task, can temporarily assign one or more employees to an understaffed company. Newsom told me, "I worked on a truck company. Our company simply could not operate with less than five men. On April 3rd our company was a company consisting of five men. When they detailed me out of Two they made that equipment inoperable, unless they sent someone in to replace me." Smith told Newsom that he did not know why he had been detailed to Thirty-one but that Newsom definitely had been ordered to report there in the morning and that he was not to report to Two.

On the morning of April 4th, Newsom reported to Thirty-one. He was assigned to a pumper company, a company that required four people to operate the equipment. He was the fifth man in the unit. He learned later that day that Thirty-one was sufficiently overstaffed to detail a man elsewhere. "During the entire period that I was at Thirty-one a man was detailed to another station."

He told me that on April 4th, "I asked the question over and over as to why I had been detailed. It just did not make any sense from a fire department personnel management viewpoint." Later, when Newsom learned of Dr. King's murder he cried. And in the agony of that moment, he said, "the fact that I had been detailed out so suspiciously became more important to me."

"Of course," he said, "the police knew who I was and that I supported the sanitation workers and Dr. King." Newsom explained how he knew that the Memphis police were tracking him.

I was definitely under police observation before April 4th. All during the movement I carried a little transistor radio that picked up police and fire calls. Just about everyone in the movement knew that I had that little radio with me all of the time which means, of course, that people outside the movement had access to that fact as well. One day we were conducting a sit-in at the council chambers. When I walked into City Hall a police officer transmitted over the police radio channel the fact that I was there. The voice on the other end asked if the officer was sure that it was me and he answered that he was reasonably sure. The officer was then instructed to make a picture of me. Then the officer reported, "he's got his radio and he might be listening to us."

An independent examination of Newsom's file confirmed the charge that he had been placed under police surveillance before April 4th.

Two weeks later Newsom decided to seek a leave of absence from the Fire Department or, in the alternative, to resign. He was deeply troubled about his transfer and the murder of Dr. King and wondered if the two events were somehow related. He asked to see the Chief of the Fire Department, but Deputy Chief Gerald Barnett made it clear to him that he would not be able to see the Chief. Newsom then submitted his letter of resignation to Barnett, who left the room and then returned a moment later. Barnett then told Newsom that he could see Chief Hamilton. Hamilton asked him why he was resigning and Newsom said, "I sensed that he was happy, very happy that I was leaving the department." Newsom told me, "After I came out of the Chief's office I saw Barnett and I said, 'I asked you before and you never did answer me, you never did give me any kind of reason. Now that this is settled, now that I have resigned and my resignation has been accepted by the Chief, now will you tell me why I was moved on April 4th?' Barnett said, 'All I can tell you is that you were moved at the request of the police.'"

When Abby Mann interviewed Barnett in 1976 he was at first vague about Newsom's allegation, didn't recall that conversation with Newsom eight years earlier, and added, "without going up there [to Fire Department headquarters] and briefing myself on the personnel records I might tell you a story. I might be mistaken. Why don't you call up and talk to Chief Williams about that. He's sitting up there with the records." When Mann asked the question again Barnett said, "he's got me mixed up with some other Chief." I asked Chief Williams if the personnel records supported Newsom's charge about being transferred and he replied, "our records show that Mr. Newsom was detailed, I mean detailed from one place to another. And our records show that he was on April 4, 1968, he was detailed to what we say is Fire Station 31. But it doesn't give a reason."

I asked if the records revealed that there were only two black firemen at Fire Station Two and that both had been detailed out to other stations on April 4th. "Well, yes," said Chief Williams, "And they both were detailed to another station. The other one was named Wallace." I asked if he had any idea why the temporary transfers had taken place. "We try to keep the fire department balanced by details. To even up the personnel to take care of the shortage at a fire station." I then asked whether Thirty-one to which Newsom had been transferred, been short? He answered, "Well, like I say, a number of them were short that day. No, Thirty-one was not short. It wasn't below maximum strength." As for Wallace, "he was detailed to number Thirty-three, which is at the airport." Was Thirty-three short that day? "No, I don't think it was."

Well, was there a shortage of personnel at Two immediately after the two black firemen were detailed out on April 4 to other stations which were not short? "Yes there was. In fact one man had to be detailed in, they were so short." When was this other man detailed in? "April 4, the day that Mr. Newsom was detailed out."

I told Chief Williams that Newsom had told me that Barnett had informed him that his transfer was the result of a police department request. Williams responded, "We had a fire and police director by the name of Holloman in 1968, at the time that King was killed. If Newsom was detailed out because of a police request it would have to come from Mr. Holloman, the director at that time. He was over the fire and police departments."

I spoke to Robert Walker, the current Director of the Fire Department, told him what I had learned about the temporary transfers of Newsom and Wallace on April 4, 1968, and asked if he had any explanation for the odd events. "I think the records will reflect that those men were temporarily assigned to other stations and I think the reason might have been that there was a lot of tension, with the black-white issue there. And I think there had been a few occasions where they were harassed. I think it was this kind of tension that existed at the moment." I asked if the transfer was for the purpose of protecting Newsom and Wallace. "Yes, Right. In other words it was to relieve them of the tension that was being built up in the neighborhood." I told Walker that Newsom had been told that the police department had requested the transfer.

It's kind of bad that Mr. Holloman was the fire and police director at that time. Now we have separate directors, one over fire and one over police. It could have been that an agreement was worked out. I don't know what his thoughts were at that time. But it could have been that they were using Two as a stakeout by the police and possibly the FBI. I have been told that there were FBI people at the fire house. You could call the FBI to check that out. I'm sure they keep the records. I know they were using it as a lookout post because the Lorraine Motel is near, in the vicinity of it.

During my next meeting with Newsom I told him that Walker had told me, in essence, that both he and Wallace had been detailed out due to the racial tension and to protect them. Newsom laughed and said, I don't believe that was the reason. I never had been threatened. I never was harassed. In fact I felt quite comfortable at Station Two. I felt a lot more comfortable there then where I was sent to. Two is in a black community and I was transferred from there into a totally white community where I was the only black in the company. I was then with a group of men I didn't know. That was a crucial time, a very difficult time, and I was very uncomfortable there. In fact, I was so upset about that new assignment and so uncomfortable there that I called the Chief on April 4th and asked how long I had to remain there and asked to be returned to Two. There just is no way that they could have thought that they were doing me a favor, protecting me or making me more comfortable by transferring me. I am sure that I was not moved because of considerations of my safety."

Members of the fire companies stationed at Fire Station Two often sit outside the station during pleasant weather. They sit or stand around on a small patch near the rear of the firehouse, overlooking the Lorraine, or on a bench near the front of the station on South Main Street. If Newsom had been at the rear of the station on April 4th he might have seen Dr. King when he was shot. He might have responded by running toward the front of the station and looking to his right. If so, he probably would have seen the killer emerge from the rooming house door just a few yards down the street.

If Newsom had been sitting on a bench in front of the station had he looked down South Main he probably would have seen the murderer emerge from the rooming house.

Newsom was an activist. One cannot predict what his response might have been, but it certainly is possible that he might have interfered with the flight of the murderer from the scene, or at least have observed the man and perhaps his vehicle and reported that information to the police.

However, for reasons not yet adequately explained by the Memphis police and fire authorities, Newsom was not there. At thirty-one all Newsom could do upon learning of Dr. King's death was to cry.

While Newsom was the only committed activist at Fire Station Two on April 3, he was not the only black firemen stationed there, N. E. Wallace was also assigned to Two at the time. On April 3 his company officer, R. T. Johnson, told him not to report to Station Two on April 4 for he too had been detailed out. Wallace asked Johnson why he was being transferred and Johnson told him, "Well, we hear that you have been threatened. You know, we don't want anything to happen to you."

Wallace told me that to his knowledge he had never been threatened while at Two and that he was certainly not afraid that anything would happen to him if he remained there. "That was a black community; there was another black in our station house and I felt comfortable there. I don't believe that I was threatened."

He said that approximately two and a half months after King was killed he was reassigned to Station Two and that he was never threatened or harmed after he returned.

I asked Wallace if he ever believed that the real reason that he had been transferred was because he had been threatened. "I've got my doubts. I always did have. I never believed I was being transferred for my own good." Prior to April 4th Wallace was in a position to observe the various strangers who appeared in and about Two. "I saw the two black detectives, Redditt and the other one. And there were also white men there in street clothes. People said they were FBI but you can't tell from just looking."

On April 4th there were no black firemen in Fire Station Two, since the only two blacks had been assigned elsewhere.

Detective Ed Redditt was at Two, however, and he was in charge of stationary security for King. His radio provided him immediate access to the mobile units in the vicinity. Assigned to assist him was a Memphis police officer, W. B. Richmond. Redditt had serious doubts about him. "I always thought that Richmond was put there to spy on me," he told me.

Redditt said, "The day of King's assassination I was at the firehouse. I could identify everybody who came and went. I knew the SCLC personnel, I knew Dr. King, I knew the cars, I knew the license plate numbers."

I asked if he had always provided security when King came to town. "Right," he answered. "So I knew who to look for. I knew the local Klansmen by sight. I knew the Invaders, the ministers, the militant groups, everyone involved in the leadership of the sanitation strike." I asked Redditt what his plan was in case of an attempt on Dr. King. "My thing was this. If something occurred in my sight Richmond would remain there, at the rear of the Firehouse, overlooking the motel. I would run to the front. I run a little bit faster, and I would try to cut off anybody in front. Richmond could radio a perimeter of security, a moving task force." I asked Redditt what the stationary security consisted of. "Just me and Richmond, that was the total security."

I asked Redditt how many police officers had provided stationary security for King in the past. "Normally we had ten, but this time it was reduced to two. . . ."

Redditt was at the airport when King arrived. He remembers one woman, no doubt still reacting to the police violence at the March 28th march, who said, "We don't want no security. We don't need no police." Redditt approached a black minister and said that he had come to provide security and the minister responded, "we don't need any security." Redditt said, "I could feel the anxiety and the bitterness because of the police macing and beating. I could understand this feeling, the reason that they didn't want any police around. But I said, 'Well I'm going to get him to the Lorraine' and I got in front of the car in which Dr. King was traveling and we proceeded on down to the Lorraine and when we got there, I saw him up the steps." A police inspector was at the Lorraine and he asked Redditt what the black leaders had said. Redditt informed the inspector that the situation was very touchy and that some people in King's party did not want the police around. As they were talking Redditt recalls that someone walked up to them and said, "We don't want no police around him. Get the hell out of there." The inspector took out his radio and called back to headquarters; "Okay, pull out," came the response from headquarters. Redditt was surprised. "I couldn't understand what the police were doing. It always is the function of the police to provide protection for people who are threatened even if some of the people around them don't want it. That's the way it always was. But with Holloman there it was different all of a sudden. I told the inspector," Redditt later said, "I need to have some type of security for King. We can't just walk away after all the threats and violence." According to Redditt the inspector asked, "Well, what do you want to do?" Redditt replied, "Well, there at the firehouse at least we can see if open; it looks out adequately on the motel. At least we can go there to establish stationary security. We won't even be seen." The inspector replied "OK, do what you want to do."

Redditt established a command post at the firehouse. The non complement of ten men had been reduced to two until approximately 6 o'clock on the afternoon of April 4th.

According to Redditt, "about an hour and a half, no more than t hours before Dr. King's assassination, Lt. Arkin, who was in intelligence, came down to the station. He said, 'Ed, they want to see you headquarters.' " Redditt was reluctant to leave his post, to abandon t entire security operation to Richmond. Redditt had difficulty leave since his plan to cut off a potential escape from the scene, should there an attempt on King's life, was predicated upon a functioning team o least two men. Arkin told Redditt that Holloman himself had ordered t to report to him at headquarters. "So what could I do? I got into the with Arkin, leaving Richmond all alone, and we proceeded to headq ters." Upon arriving at police headquarters Redditt was taken into conference room.

"It was like a meeting of the Joint Chief of Staff. In this room, before Dr. King was murdered, were the heads and the second in command of I guess every law enforcement operation in this area you c think of. I had never seen anything like it before. The Sheriff, Highway Patrol, Army Intelligence, the National Guard. You name i was in the room."

Redditt recalled that, "I walked right in and Holloman addressed at once. He said, 'Ed, there's a contract right on you.' I said, 'What you mean?' I couldn't understand why I was there at this top-t meeting and why I was being told about a contract on me in front of whole group. The whole thing didn't make any sense."

Redditt said that Holloman then introduced him to a man in the r dressed in civilian clothes. Redditt remembers very clearly that Hc man, indicating a man at the conference table said, "Ed, this gentlema from the United States Secret Service in Washington, D.C. He secured information from the Highway Patrol in Mississippi that a gr in Mississippi had a contract out to kill you. This group has let the cont out to a hit man from St. Louis to get you. That hit man may be her Memphis now. He, [indicating the Secret Service man again] has flown down from Washington to give me this information."

The events and assertions were moving too quickly for Redditt to calmly evaluate them. A top-level police mini-convention to which he had been summoned to be informed that the United States Secret Service had sent its representative by plane from Washington to warn of a three-state conspiracy to kill him, a relatively unknown local detective, was difficult to assess and impossible for him to believe.

Later he told me that he could not believe that the United States Secret Service, which is primarily obligated to provide protection for Presidents, Vice Presidents, members of their families, and candidates for the two highest elective offices, had taken a real interest in him. Upon reflection he also found it somewhat troubling to consider that if the Secret Service in Washington really did have information that someone was stalking the streets of Memphis presumably armed with a gun and motivated by a contract to kill him that the agent in Washington would pick up the telephone and ask his secretary to book passage for him on the next convenient flight to Memphis, rather than report the threat by telephone at once to the responsible persons in Memphis. In fact, nothing about the story rang true on reflection, and with the perspective afforded by the inexorable passing of time and events at the moment, in that room crowded with the police elite, without benefit of analysis, all Redditt knew was that something was terribly wrong.

Holloman continued, "So Ed, in order to protect you, I have personally made reservations for you and your family at the Rivermont Holiday Inn. You and your family are to move in their right now for your safety."

Redditt said, "My first thought was that Dr. King was going to be leaving the Lorraine shortly and that I should be there. Then I thought about my mother-in-law who was really quite ill. I knew that if she heard this rumor that I had been threatened and if she had to move it might be very bad for her. Anyway I knew that Richmond couldn't handle it alone there at the station house and besides I was the one that knew the people, the cars, the license numbers and I was the one that could spot trouble." Redditt responded to Holloman, "Sir, I'm not going. You can't stop a contract. If there is one on me I'll just stay on the streets and try to be cautious. But I won't involve my family. My family will stay at home. I'll stay on the streets. If they're going to get me let them get me on the streets while I'm nowhere near my family."

Holloman answered sharply, "Redditt you are going to the Rivermont with your family. That's an order and there is nothing to discuss."

Redditt made one more effort. He told Holloman that his mother-in-law was too sick to be moved and too sick to be left alone. Holloman thought for a moment and said "All right. You just go home and stay there." Redditt asked if he could finish his assignment at the Lorraine first. Holloman said, "You are going home. You are going home now. That's an order."

Redditt drove home with Memphis police officers. When they drove up in front of Redditt's house, the Memphis police informed him that they were going to stay in his house with him. At that point it became clear to Redditt that their assignment quite obviously was to watch him; not guard the house.

I thought they might sit outside in unmarked cars, maintaining radio contact with each other and with me, and in that way provide some protection. But their orders apparently were to stay in the house with me. That way they could watch me but they couldn't protect me. If someone threw a bomb in a window those two officers would just have been two more casualties. Then I really knew something was wrong. I sat in the car and thought about Dr. King. I had been with him so much, everytime he came to Memphis, I had heard him speak so often that I was practically one of his disciples. I thought about him at the Lorraine without adequate protection. I didn't want to leave the car, to go into the house, because I thought that the presence of the other officers was going to upset my mother-in-law. So we sat in the car for a few minutes and then the radio announced that Dr. King had been shot.

Redditt ran into the house as soon as he heard the news.

I thought that it would be too much of a shock for my mother-in-law. Anyway the excitement of having the police there watching me didn't help. And we thought she didn't have a radio. We were trying to keep the news from her. But she did have a small transistor radio and she heard that he had been killed. The next night she screamed out "Dr. King, Dr. King, Dr. King. God, take me instead of Dr. King." And she died. She died of grief.

I asked Redditt when he returned to work and how the contract story was finally disposed of. "It was Thursday, April 4 that they ordered me to go home. I called Thursday to see if I could participate in the homicide investigation. I called Friday. I called Saturday. When I called Sunday, the basic investigation was over and they ordered me to go back to work. The contract? Nothing else has ever been said about the contract on my life."

When Redditt was removed from the scene only W. B. Richmond, then a Memphis patrolman, now a sergeant, was left on the scene. My interview with him was less than satisfactory. I began by introducing myself and then saying, "I've been told that you were the one police officer who was a witness to the murder of Dr. King." He responded, "I'd like to know who gave you my phone number." I told him that I had found it in the telephone book following his name. Then he said, "I have nothing to talk to anybody about the King killing because I don't know anything about it." He denied that he was at or near the Lorraine Motel on April 4; he denied he had been in a stake-out with or without Ed Redditt; and he denied that he had been near the fire station that day. When I asked him what observations he had on April 4 he said, "I had none." When I asked him how far from the Lorraine Motel he was when Dr. King was shot he said that he was "at police headquarters" and added, "I didn't hear the shot."

It was clear to me that Richmond had not told the truth to me. He told me that he had been "talked to by the Department of Justice" during the first part of July 1976. "They're the only people I'm supposed to talk to about it. I don't know anything about the man's killing." He told me that he had told the Department of Justice "the same things that I told you." Weeks later when I returned to Memphis I spoke with Richmond again. This time he told me that he had been at the firehouse and that he was there when King was killed. He said he had talked to his supervisors who said that he should give me that information. He said that was all he remembered about the murder.

Later two investigators for the Citizens Commission of Inquiry interviewed two firemen who were present when King was shot. One of them, Charles E. Stone, said, "And Lt. Redditt, I believe that was his name, was gone and the other boy was here. Only one was here at the time of the shooting."

The other fireman, William B. King, said,

Well it was around six o'clock when it happened. We had a warning test and at six o'clock the alarm goes off. So I know it was right at six o'clock when he was shot. He had come out to the banister. He was standing there talking to his chauffeur who was on the ground. The chauffeur was on the ground and all of a sudden he kind of looked up, at least it looked like he looked up and there was this noise and he fell. And there were several people crying at the motel and this one guy come out just fell down and started crawling and crawling. There was a lot of emotion at that time. We heard a lot of policemen shouting and hollering over there because the door was shut and I forget the exact words that was said but there was a lot of emotion. And I think we all ran to see who was shot. And then this policeman, Richmond, he got on the phone and made a call. Well, in no time he left.

Since Richmond had a radio, which could have provided immediate access to the police mobile units in the area as well as to headquarters, it is difficult to understand why he did not use it and difficult to imagine who he might have telephoned. It becomes even more puzzling in light of the plan that Redditt had promulgated and shared with Richmond. That plan called for Redditt to cover South Main Street and for Richmond to use the radio to alert the mobile units. One must concede that Richmond could not have done both. The mystery lies in trying to determine why he attempted neither.

If the elaborate charade, which included the removal of Redditt and the detailing of Newsum and Wallace, was designed to strip away the security just before Dr. King was killed, in order to facilitate the escape of the sniper, it was an ultimately successful plan. The murderer fled, unobserved and unimpeded.

Chapter Nineteen

APRIL 4, ATLANTA

by Mark Lane

Arthur Murtaugh, the veteran FBI agent, said,

The day that King was shot, I was at the office, leaving for the day, with an FBI agent who was at the supervisory level. He was a young man, twenty-nine to thirty-two years old, handsome, nice dresser—reasonably intelligent and the women were crazy about him in the office. He was friendly with me.

We heard the announcement, that King had been shot as we were preparing to leave. This agent jumped for joy, literally leaped in the air, yelling, "They got Zorro! They got the son of a bitch! I hope he dies!"

As we punched our salmon-colored cards out, the agent explained to me how King was nothing but a Goddamn Communist troublemaker anyway. Then we heard that King had died. Again, he was elated. He just went crazy with joy.

I said, "For Christ's sake, they killed a great leader," and as we walked to the parking lot, we had a discussion. The agent told me how King had been ruining the United States; that he was dividing our people; that he was Communist-dominated; and that "if the lazy Goddamned niggers had worked, instead of demonstrating, they could make it just like anybody else in this country—for example, the Italians and the Irish!"

The agent was a member of the squad assigned to investigate the murder of Dr. King. "Memphis had the early lead material," said Arthur Murtaugh, and the Bureau in Washington directed the early stages of the investigation. It was directed out of Atlanta after a day or two.

Teletype leads would come in, and the case supervisor would assign the leads to various agents. "Now the assigning of leads would make a lot of difference," said Murtaugh. "Up until civil rights were pushed hard in the sixties, I was never assigned to civil rights work at all. Only when they got to the point where they had to get some answers would they assign anybody like me. They had been assigning old-time Southern agents to handle civil rights cases."

How did the fact that those assigned to investigate King's death had been members of the get-King Squad, affect that effort? "I think they might not have gotten the right answer on a lot of these things simply because there was no will to get the right answer," said Murtaugh. "They didn't want to ask the right questions. The feeling against King, in the Bureau, was so strong," said Murtaugh, that if the Bureau had had advance information of an assassination plot against King, and no one else knew about it—they would sit on it. And let King get killed.

The Bureau wanted to get the investigation wrapped up and get out of it. I think there was sentiment in the Bureau, also—an extreme sentiment, at all costs, to keep the blacks from making any inroads.

I would not depend on an investigation, by the people I knew, to be very accurate. Statements came out from the Bureau, within twenty-four hours of each killing, that there was no conspiracy involved in the deaths of President Kennedy, Dr. King, and Bobby Kennedy.

I talked about conspiracy in Atlanta regarding King, and thought about it on the Kennedy case. I was told that we weren't to think about conspiracy. Our jurisdiction was very flimsy anyway, since King wasn't a government official. What were we doing investigating it?

I feel it was a political decision. I don't think the crime was ever investigated. In fact, I'm convinced it was never investigated. It wasn't investigated like the Mississippi killings, it wasn't investigated like the Hoffa disappearance. It wasn't even investigated as well as King was, when he was alive. I think eventually, if everybody keeps pushing, eventually some way, sometime, the whole thing will break open—you'll probably find a conspiracy.

Maybe it's a movement. You've got to be able to think in terms of the fiendish minds of people in counterintelligence. If we're right, the King killing was some kind of a counterintelligence scheme, cooked up by somebody and it could be anybody. It could be anyone who could manipulate things in such a way to get them to happen. I think it can be done, and I think it was done.

There are too many questions about Oswald and Ray. How did they get all the way across the country? And where the hell did the money come from? How did they have their identities covered? No guy like Ray can do that sort of thing on his own. It just didn't happen that way.

Chapter Twenty

DIRECTOR HOLLOMAN

by Mark Lane

On July 27, 1976, my close friend Abby Mann and I interviewed Frank Holloman in his Memphis office. Holloman was then the director of Future Memphis, Inc., a corporation established by one hundred leading businesses in Memphis to "cut off trouble before it begins" and to create a better image for Memphis. He was at first reluctant to talk about the King assassination. "The reason I resigned as director of fire and police," he told us, "was so that I would not have to answer questions about that case." Yet, Abby was persuasive and with a minimum shifting of emphasis regarding his credits and a somewhat more substantial but temporary shift of his perspective, he convinced Holloman that he was a sympathetic listener, and perhaps an advocate of Holloman's cause as well. For example, Abby did not spend a great deal of time explaining that he had written the American film classic, Judgment at Nuremberg, or that he had been a close friend of Dr. King. Instead, he pointed to the fact that he created Kojak, a fact which often has caused Abby to wince but caused, in this sitting a warm and welcoming smile across Holloman's face. Abby's most impressive moment came when he referred to the chairman of the Church Committee as "somewhat of an extremist," followed quickly by his observation that "it is easy to criticize the FBI but where would we be without it." As I pondered that proposition for a moment, I saw Holloman melt and heard him ask Abby, "Well, what can I tell you that will help you?"

Abby explained that he was writing an objective screenplay for NBC-TV on the life of Dr. King and that while the program would not dwell on his death, quite naturally it would refer to it. He introduced me as his assistant in the project and said that I had done some research on the subject and would like to ask him a few questions. Holloman stared at me for a moment or two and we were both aware, I believe, that I had not offered my own police-oriented credentials.

Abby began to ask Holloman about the March 28th demonstration and Holloman responded:

There was a large number of people involved; a large number of school students. From early morning until the time of the actual step-off of the march we were receiving numerous reports of students moving from their school areas to the area where the march was to start. When the march started Dr. King stepped out. He was in the lead. And behind him violence did break out. They began to break windows. We felt we had no alternative at that point except to stop the march. We ordered the march stopped and ordered dispersal of the crowd. The crowd at that point in the rear was completely out of hand and we did have to use tear gas in order to disperse the crowd. I do recall the break out, then the fight, then the riot situation developed all over town.

Abby asked, "There was a boy killed later wasn't there?" Holloman replied, "Yes . . . he was dying in the south, as I recall it was in the south part of the city in which there was a connection with looting as I recall. It was controversial as to whether or not there was a justifiable killing. We thought it was a justifiable defense of a policeman's life because the policeman thought his life was in danger."

I asked Holloman what his assessment of the situation was just before Dr. King came to Memphis. "What were the feelings and what were the police problems in terms of potential racial conflicts?" Holloman said that, "from the time of the first riots until he returned, the feelings in the community were naturally very high. He came back for the purpose of making a successful march. We felt that there was a danger to Dr. King by information that we received that there would possibly be more violence and possibly violence toward him. And so we felt so strongly about it that we went to the federal court in order to seek an injunction against the march which was scheduled whenever it was, I've forgotten." I asked, "What was the information you received about violence which would happen against King?" Holloman answered, "It was an accumulation of intelligence information we had received. I will not be more specific on that." I asked Holloman what security was afforded to Dr. King by the police in the light of the potential violence against him. He answered, "the security we provided for him was a peripheral security because his people refused personal on-the-scene security." Holloman then pointed to my tape recorder and said, "Turn this off a minute." Holloman's warm tone had cooled a bit. By dramatically altering the course of the discussion to more general and less troublesome areas such as his police background, his "absolutely down the middle neutral position" regarding the strike and other trying events, Abby and I were able to secure his permission to turn on the tape recorder again.

Soon after the recording device was reactivated, I told Holloman that Ed Redditt had told me that he had always been in charge of security every time King came to Memphis. I asked Holloman if Redditt had been correct. Holloman stared at me and, in a harsh and almost angry manner that is quite noticeable when the tape is played, asked me, "Did you talk to Ed Redditt himself?" I said that I had and then again asked if Redditt had always been in charge of providing police security for King and if he had been in charge on April 4th. Holloman replied "He could have been. I don't recall though." I then told Holloman what Redditt had told me about the exchange that took place between them in the conference room just before the murder of Dr. King. Holloman said, "I arranged for him to go to a hotel." I asked Holloman if there had been a threat to kill Redditt and he answered:

Yes, yes. I got a report on the line for it and immediately pulled. See I had been in Court due to actual time I was in court until five o'clock. I think it was four, in federal court and I came back in the office. I was then advised. I didn't know about this until I got back to my office. Shortly after I got back to the office I was then advised that a threat had been made against Redditt's life. I immediately ordered Redditt to my office. I cannot tell you frankly where the report came from. I don't know the source. I can't say. Some people say it was the Secret Service. Some say it was somebody else. I frankly do not know. As far as I recall it came from a substantial source that convinced me that it was true. So I immediately called him into my office, told him what the report was and then told him that his life was invaluable as far as I was concerned and that I would take every effort to protect him. And I made arrangements to have him placed in a motel in Memphis under an assumed name together with his entire family which he did not want to do because Ed Redditt is a brave man. But I told him there was no choice, that his life was in danger and I was going to do what I could to protect it. Ah, this was after five o'clock. At 6:01 as I recall I was still in my office by myself handling some work cleaning out my desk before I went home when the report came that Dr. King had been killed.

I asked, "When Redditt left your office was it your understanding that he would then be going home or to the motel but not to the Lorraine Motel?" Holloman said, "Right." I inquired, "Well was he at that point in charge of security at the Lorraine for the police department? I don't mean the peripheral TAC [Tactical] squad which had its own operation but I mean the on-the-scene." Holloman said, "At that point I cannot say whether he was or not. If he says he was I have no reason to question that as to whether or not he was in charge. He was not in charge of the operation. Let's put it that way."

I reported that Redditt said that there was only one other person with him, a fellow officer. I asked Holloman if Redditt was replaced by anyone else. He answered "Was he what?" "Replaced at the scene by anyone else at the Lorraine Motel?" I asked again. Frank Holloman responded, "I do not recall because at that point in time I was I had handled this particular thing. I was sitting there trying to do some work on my desk when 6:01, which was less than an hour, this happened, so I don't know. I was never in that direct contact. I had been in court all day and it happened; as far as a replacement, frankly I do not know." I asked Holloman if it was unusual for him to be notified that there was a contract out on a police officer. He answered, "There was never any contract. I mean there was no contract. It isn't that dramatic in the modern day organized crime. I just was advised that a certain organization was going to kill him." I asked, "Organization? Do you remember which it was?" Holloman answered, "Yes, but I'm not going to reveal it. It was an organization. Not locally. Not local; not a local organization."

I wondered if Holloman had ever considered what might appear to some to be obvious; that the death threat about Redditt was developed for the purpose of stripping away King's security. Holloman answered firmly, not to say repetitively, "Absolutely not. No way. No possible way. No way."

In fact, the death threat, real or contrived, was responsible for Redditt's removal and that removal was useful, perhaps critical, to the murderer in his escape from the scene. I asked Holloman why the only two black firemen at Fire Station Two had been removed from that assignment on the very day of the murder. He said, "I never heard about that. No. And I would say there's absolutely no connection with any of it. So for whatever reason he may have been transferred, he was not there in the first place with the King operation." When I informed Holloman of Newsum's information regarding his transfer, he answered "I don't think it would be true. I knew what was happening as far as the police department was concerned. And I knew of no orders; no instructions of any kind. And I don't believe that it would have gone through except through me. And it did not."

I again asked Holloman if he recalled the original source of the threat to Redditt's life. He said:

No. I don't recall. And so you're going into something that I haven't thought about before. I just cannot recall. I guess the events—of the shock of the next hour. That's really completely in my memory, as far as that part was concerned. And I don't recall. I do know it came from a reputable source. I would say an agency. Whether it was the Secret Service, I frankly cannot tell you right now. I couldn't testify to that fact.

I asked, "If it was the FBI you probably would have remembered it?" Holloman answered:

Not necessarily. No, not necessarily. No it could have been the FBI, it could have been the Secret Service—it's just right there it's a blank. I don't recall. The source was so positive, and so reliable, that I immediately took action. In spite of what was going on at that time, I believed it. And that's the reason I took the action that I did.

Almost immediately after Holloman gave that answer he picked up the microphone and tossed it towards me, saying, "Alright, put that thing off for good now."

There is much that is troubling about Holloman's explanation of the events. Why is he reluctant to release the name of the organization that conspired to kill Redditt? Why did he not replace Redditt if he truly believed that Redditt had to be removed? Why did he take no action to apprehend those responsible for conspiring to kill one of his police officers, a crime, from the viewpoint of law enforcement officials, more serious than any other? How could he fail to remember the agency or bureau, that flew a representative into Memphis to warn him about the threat to Redditt?

Redditt was certain when he talked to me that Holloman identified the agent on April 4th as a representative of the Secret Service. Yet, Redditt later conducted an independent inquiry and discovered, not at all to his surprise, that the Secret Service had dispatched no one to Memphis that day and that the officials there had never even heard of the threat to Redditt's life. If Holloman could remember his source, his allegation could be verified or proven to be untrue. His loss of memory, due, he asserts, to the "shock" of learning of the death of Dr. King, is both convenient, and speaks of a sensitive man deeply committed to the law.

If one secures the threshold impression that Holloman's failure to take adequate precautions was due to his lack of experience or that his memory was erased due to the personal grief that he experienced when a man he respected was murdered, an examination of his background may alter that concept.

Holloman had been with the FBI for a quarter of a century. He was the Special Agent In Charge (SAC) of the FBI office in Atlanta, where Dr. King lived and where his church and family were; he had been SAC at the FBI office in Jackson, Mississippi; he had been the SAC at the Memphis office, as well, when many of the problems which led to the strike were developing. During Holloman's last eight years with the Bureau, he worked in the FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C., what the FBI refers to as the SOG—the Seat of Government. J. Edgar Hoover viewed American Presidents as mere transients who passed through his administration, and the SOG was Mr. Hoover's office.

Holloman said of that period, "I was the Inspector in Hoover's office. You might say the Inspector-in-Charge of his office."

When Abby asked him about the changes made by the Church Committee about the numerous illegal and immoral actions of the Hoover FBI, many of which emanated from that office when Holloman was the Inspector-In-Charge, Holloman said, "I have nothing to apologize for that we ever did when I was there. What we did we had to do and it was proper to do it. J. Edgar Hoover was a friend of mine and I saw nothing that he did that was wrong."

It is in view of Hoover's pathological hatred of Dr. King, an obsession which led him to commit numerous crimes in order to destroy him, and which apparently did not trouble Holloman, that one must evaluate Holloman's claim of amnesia shock occasioned by Dr. King's death.

Chapter Twenty-One

APRIL 5, MEMPHIS

by Mark Lane

Wayne Chastian, now a practicing lawyer in Memphis, was a reporter for the Memphis Press Scimitar, one of the two major-daily newspapers at the time of the assassination of Dr. King.

After the police concluded that the shot had been fired from the bathroom window in the rooming house, Chastian came across an unpublished photograph in the newspaper's files. Taken by an Associated Press photographer from the bathroom window, it showed the Lorraine Motel balcony as the sniper would have seen it if the shot had been fired from there.

Chastian noted that the view was obscured by branches from trees growing on the embankment between the rooming house and the motel.

Later that day he discussed that oddity in the case with Kay Black, another reporter for the Memphis Press Scimitar. Chastian told me that although the picture was puzzling he paid little attention to it, "because at that time I believed the shot had come from that window. I believed that the police were right about that."

Chastian has continued to maintain a growing file on the case and has talked with many witnesses since. "Now I no longer believe the shot came from there. Now I think that picture and those trees take an added significance," he told me.

Later Kay Black received a telephone call from William B. Ingram, the former Mayor of Memphis. Ingram had called to inform Black that the city was cutting down the trees on the embankment between the rooming house and the motel. She later told me, "now I hadn't been in the rooming house looking through that bathroom window but I do recall Wayne Chastian having said that he didn't see how someone could shoot through the trees to the motel. He said that he was puzzled how a clear shot could have been fired because he didn't see how you could see through the branches..."

I asked Ms. Black if she could describe the trees. I was over there all the time after Dr. King and his regiment arrived because I was covering the black community during the strike. I would go over there and have coffee with people if anything was happening. And it was spring and the normal thing was to be in the parking lot, the motel court. Right above the lot, on this embankment there was sort of an overgrown place. And of course I noticed it. There were a good sized amount of trees there—and they made a screen, more or less between the motel and the rooming house. They were between ten and twelve feet tall. Oak trees, and perhaps willows.

I asked Ms. Black if, in her judgment, the trees would have interfered with a shot from the bathroom window to the motel balcony. "Well it occurred to me that they might, and on reflection I think they might have. That is why Mayor Ingram called, I think. They provided very substantial screening. And they were possibly important evidence and they were being cut down just as the investigation began."

Ms. Black determined that the city of Memphis had arranged for the trees to be cut down and had ordered the city sanitation department to remove them. She said that Ingram had called her in the morning. She reported the information to her desk and that afternoon she visited the murder scene. "And those trees were down. The screen was gone. There was just no way any longer to know if that shot could have been possible."

PART SIX

THE STATE OF TENNESSEE VS. JAMIES EARL RAY

Chapter Twenty-Two

THE CASE AGAINST RAY

by Mark Lane

On March 10, 1969, in Division III of the Criminal Court of Shelby County, Tennessee, James Earl Ray entered a prearranged plea of guilty in the murder of Dr. King. Judge W. Preston Battle accepted the plea after Ray's attorney, Percy Foreman, had worked out the arrangements with Memphis Attorney General Phil Canale, the prosecuting attorney.

Under Tennessee law, Canale explained to the jurors:

It is incumbent upon the State in a plea of guilty to murder in the first degree to put on certain proof for your consideration.

We have to put on proof of what we lawyers call the proof of the corpus delicti which is the body of the crime. We will also put on several lay witnesses or police officers to fill you in on certain important aspects of this case, and then we will introduce certain physical evidence through these witnesses, and Mr. Beasley, or Mr. Dwyer will question these witnesses, and Mr. Beasley will give you an agreed stipulation of facts that the State has gotten up which contains what the State would prove by witnesses if this went to trial, and you will have the benefit of all that information through this stipulation of fact which has been agreed to by the State and by the Defendant as to what the State would prove if this matter went to trial.

Before the morning had ended and the jurors excused for lunch, the case against James Earl Ray for the murder of Dr. King had been spelled out in detail.

Several witnesses were called and questioned by Robert Dwyer, an Assistant Attorney General. Foreman did not object to any question put to any witness, even when the question was leading and improper. Foreman did not cross-examine any witness.

The first witness called was Reverend Samuel Kyles. He said he had known Dr. King for more than ten years. He had been with him in room 306 of the Lorraine Motel for approximately forty-five minutes. "I had gone to pick Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., up to go home, go to my house at 2215 South Parkway East for a soul food dinner." Dwyer asked "Was Dr. King alive and in good health and in good spirits at that time and at that location." Kyles answered affirmatively.

Dwyer asked Kyles what took place at 6:00 P.M.

Fairly close to 6:00 P.M. we were going to leave for dinner. Dr. Abernathy was also in the room. Dr. King came out. I was still in the room. He came out on the balcony and was greeting some of the people who were in the courtyard, and he came back in the room, I believe to get his coat, and the both of us came out together, and we stood at this point on the balcony for about, about three minutes greeting some people who also were going to dinner with us. And we stood together there about three or four minutes, and I turned to my right to walk away and said I was going and get my car and take some of the people who were going to dinner.

I got approximately 5 or 6 steps away from him and I heard what I now know to be a shot, and I looked over the railing. I thought it was a car backfiring, or something, and when I realized what had happened, I turned back to my left and saw Dr. King lying in a position thusly with a tremendous wound in his right side. He was laying in this position with the wound here (indicating).

Kyles said that when the shot was fired he looked in the general direction of the rooming house. "Yes, I looked over there because there were bushes and things."

Kyles was asked to describe the wound that had been inflicted upon Dr. King.

It tore this much of his face away that I could see, and I also noticed that the shot had cut his necktie, just cut right off at that point.

I remember that because he had been trying to find out—he thought somebody was playing a trick in the room—he couldn't find his necktie and he finally did find it, and we had had some conversation about his shirt and his necktie.

Kyles was asked if he had attended the funeral of Dr. King and he replied that he had.

Through the testimony of the first witness the State had established that Dr. King was shot at approximately 6:00 P.M. on April 4, 1968, and that he subsequently died.

Chauncey Eskridge, a Chicago lawyer who had represented Dr. King, testified next. He said that he had been "standing in the courtroom looking up at door 306" at about 6:00 o'clock in the evening when Dr. King came out of his room. He said that soon "the sound came from my right car and said 'Zing—' ". He agreed with Kyles that the sound came from the general direction of the rooming house and that when he looked there he did not see anybody moving. Eskridge said that he had gone to the hospital with Dr. King and later attended his funeral.

Eskridge's testimony broke no new ground and was corroborative of Kyles' statement.

The State called no other eyewitnesses to the murder of Dr. King. The next witness was Dr. Jerry Thomas Francisco, the Medical Examiner for Shelby County. He testified about the autopsy that was performed on Dr. King's body.

The examination revealed a gunshot wound to the right side of the face, passing through the body into the neck, through the spinal cord at the base of the neck, with the bullet lodging beneath the skin near the shoulder blade on the left.

Q. Cause of death was what, Dr. Francisco?

A. A gunshot wound to the cervical and thoracic spinal cord.

Q. In your medical opinion, how soon did death occur from that wound?

A. Shortly after death, shortly after injury.

Q. Did you recover anything from the body, Dr. Francisco?

A. Yes.

Q. I am going to show you an object and ask you if you can identify those, Dr. Francisco?

A. Yes.

Q. And what is that, please, sir?

A. This is the bullet that was removed from the body at the time of the autopsy.

Q. What, if anything, did you do with that bullet, Dr. Francisco, that you recovered?

A. This bullet was identified by number and delivered to representative of the police department.

Francisco said that the bullet had angled downward from right to left passing through the chin, the base of the neck, and the spinal cord into the back. Francisco offered the opinion that the angle of the bullet through the body was consistent with a shot having been fired from the rooming house.

Francisco did not state that he knew where Dr. King had been standing, which direction he had been facing, or if he had been leaning over when he was shot, thereby considerably reducing the value of his opinion as to the origin of the shot.

Inspector N. E. Zachary of the Memphis Police Department testified that he had been the inspector in charge of the Homicide Bureau on April 4, 1968. He was at police headquarters when Dr. King was shot and when he heard that news on a radio broadcast he immediately went to the Lorraine Motel and began assigning men to the investigation. He then went to Main Street, he said, and stopped in front of the Canipe Amusement Company.

I found a package rolled up in a bedspread which consisted of a blue briefcase and a Browning pasteboard box containing a rifle.

At that particular time I put a guard on it with instructions to let no one touch it or move it until we could take photographs of it.

He said that the package had been wrapped in a bedspread when he found it. Zachary identified various articles that had been in the package including a box, a rifle that had been in the box, a pair of binoculars, a case for the binoculars, a pair of undershorts, a shaving kit, two cans of Schlitz beer, a hair brush, a transistor radio, a pair of pliers, a hammer, a paper bag, a copy of the Commercial Appeal, a Memphis newspaper, and some cartridges. He testified that he gave the evidence "to the FBI sometime around 10:00 P.M. that night" by delivering the material to "Mr. Jensen of the Memphis FBI." Zachary answered affirmatively when asked, "The purpose of turning these objects that you have identified here over to the FBI was to be sent to Washington for its examination, Inspector Zachary?"

Robert Jensen testified that on April 4, 1968, he was the Special Agent in Charge (SAC) of the Memphis Division of the FBI. He said that at about 6:05 P.M. he was told that Dr. King had been shot. He testified, "I called my Washington headquarters to advise them of the information which I had received, and then subsequently dispatched men to assist in the investigation." He said that he assigned agents to the investigation "probably around 6:30." The twenty-five minute hiatus, unexplained by the testimony or by subsequent official Bureau statements. leads to the conclusion that there was no federal effort to close off the area to prevent the murderer's escape. Since the city of Memphis borders on the states of Arkansas and Mississippi, both just minutes away, no local police blockade was likely to prove effective.

Jensen said that at 10:00 o'clock that evening he was in the offices of the Memphis Police Department. At that time, he said, "certain evidence was turned over to me." Dwyer inquired about the evidence.

Q. I am going to ask you, Mr. Jensen, to look at—there is a green spread here, here is some pliers and a hammer, here is a rifle, here is some shaving articles, binoculars, beer cans, newspaper, tee shirt, shorts, there is a transistor radio over there (indicating).

I will ask you if those objects were turned over to you by Inspector Zachary of the Memphis Police Department?

A. Yes, they were.

Q. And the purpose of that was what, sir?

A. In order that I could send them to our laboratory for examination.

Q. And did you do that, Mr. Jensen?

A. Yes, I did.

Q. And can you tell us briefly how that was done, sir?

A. Yes. The evidence was taken over to my office, was personally wrapped under my supervision, and when all the material was wrapped, I dispatched an agent to Washington to physically carry the material to the laboratory."

Jensen said that FBI agents discovered that a man named Eric S. Galt had registered at the Rebel Motel, although he did not say and was not asked for the date of that registration. He said that Galt had been driving a white Mustang. He testified that the FBI had discovered that the rifle had been sold by the Aeromarine Supply Company in Birmingham. Jensen said that the Mustang was discovered on April 11th. He said that the pliers and hammer may have been purchased from a hardware store in Los Angeles and that the tee shirt and shorts had been laundered in Los Angeles as well.

He then said that the FBI investigation culminated in the arrest of James Earl Ray. At that point Dwyer excused Jensen and said, "That is all the proof the State cares to offer at this time, if the Court please, except some stipulations by Mr. Beasley."

Through the testimony of witnesses the State had offered evidence that Dr. King had been shot on April 4, 1968, that he subsequently had died, that the shot had come from the direction of a clump of bushes and the rear of a rooming house, and that a package had been discovered near the entrance to the front of the rooming house. In addition, a witness had testified regarding the presence in Memphis of Eric S. Galt and his vehicle.

After a brief recess, the jurors were returned to the courtroom to listen to a lengthy narration by Assistant Attorney General James Beasley. He began, "May it please the Court, Gentlemen of the Jury, I propose at this time to narrate to you gentlemen a stipulation of the facts and evidence that the State would prove in addition to the testimony that you heretofore heard in the trial of this cause." Beasley contended that the State could prove that Ray had rented a room in the rooming house.

The State would show in the course of its proof, Gentlemen of the Jury, through Mrs. Bessie Brewer, who was employed as manager of this rooming house, that on the afternoon of April the 4th, between 3:00 and 3:30 P.M. in the afternoon, the Defendant appeared here at Mrs. Brewer's office or apartment that was used as an office in this rooming house. Under the name, John Willard, he requested a room for a week.

He added, "He was taken to room 5-B which is located in this section (indicating). The Defendant did rent this room for a week from Mrs. Brewer." Beasley said that the State could prove that Ray had purchased Bushnell binoculars from Ralph Carpenter at the York Arms Company located one mile north of the rooming house.

A witness, Elizabeth Copeland, could testify, Beasley said, that between 4:30 and 4:45 P.M. a white Mustang parked near and to the south of the Canipe Amusement Company and was still there at 5:20 P.M. when she left the area.

Beasley said.

At approximately 6:00 P.M., Mr. Stephens heard the shot coming apparently through this wall from the bathroom. He then got up, went through this room out into the corridor in time to see the left profile of the Defendant as he turned down this passageway which leads to an opening with a stairwell going down to Main Street.

According to Beasley, Guy Warren Canipe and two customers were in the Canipe establishment and "saw the back of a white man going away from that area in a general direction on down Main Street, observing momen-tarly thereafter a white Mustang pull from the curb, head north on Main Street with one occupant."

That package, Beasley said, was wrapped in the green bedspread, previously identified, and contained the rifle, the binoculars and the other items in evidence. Beasley said that a crime scene search of the bathroom in the rooming house by officers of the Memphis Police Department "found marks in the bottom of the tub consistent with shoe or scuff marks" and that

The sill of this window in the bathroom was observed by Inspector Zachary to have what appeared to be a fresh indentation in it. This sill was ordered removed, was cut away, was subsequently sent to the FBI for comparison, and the proof would show through expert testimony that the markings on this sill were consistent with the machine markings as reflected on the barrel of the 30.06 rifle which has heretofore been introduced to you gentlemen.

Beasley said the state could prove that Ray had purchased the 30.06 rifle that had been found in the package outside Canipe's Store and that he had used the pseudonym Harvey Lowmeyer when he bought the rifle in Birmingham.

The evidence would prove, said the prosecutor, that Ray had purchased the white Mustang for $1,995 on August 30, 1967, then using the name Eric S. Galt. At that point Beasley said that the evidence would prove that Ray entered Mexico on October 7 and remained there until the middle of November 1967. He said the State's proof would locate Ray in Los Angeles, New Orleans, and Birmingham in the intervening weeks. The State knew when Ray drove from Los Angeles to New Orleans and who accompanied him. The State knew that Ray was a customer of the Home Service Laundry Company located at 5280 Hollywood Boulevard and was prepared to offer Mrs. Mary Lucy Panella to testify that Ray brought his laundry in quite regularly between December 1967, and early March 1968. She was able, Beasley said, to identify her laundry marks on the undergarments found in the package.

Beasley continued,

Mr. Avidson, Rodney Avidson, who operated the dance studio at Long Beach, California, would testify with reference to knowing the Defendant as Eric S. Galt during the period from December the 5th until February the 12th while Mr. Galt was taking dancing lessons at his place of business.

Through the testimony of Mr. Thomas Reeves Lau, the State would show that the Defendant, under the name of Eric S. Galt, enrolled in the International School of Bartending there in Los Angeles, and he attended this school from January the 19th until March the 2nd, when he graduated. We were able to obtain a photograph in color reflecting the graduation picture from Mr. Lau, which you will see does show the Defendant along with Mr. Lau, who was standing, as you gentlemen view the picture, to the Defendant's left and is holding the diploma in front of him with the name, Eric S. Galt.

Ray drove from Los Angeles to New Orleans and then spent the night of March 22, 1968 at the Flamingo Motel in Selma, Alabama, Beasley said. The prosecutor continued:

We would show through Mr. Jimmy Garner, who operates a rooming house in Atlanta, Georgia, that he rented a room to the Defendant under the name, Eric S. Galt, on March the 24th, 1968; that he collected a week's rent and subsequently on March the 31st, collected a second week's rent from the Defendant as Eric S. Galt; that at the time of collecting the rent on March the 31st, that the Defendant did write his name out as Eric S. Galt on an envelope, and this envelope was subsequently turned in in the course of this investigation.

That on the morning of April the 5th, Mr. Garner went into the room that had been rented to the Defendant as Eric Galt, and for purposes of changing the linen, at that time he found a note in substance saying, "I have to go to Birmingham. I will be back later to pick up my, within about a week to pick up my television set and my other articles"; that on April the 14th of 1968, some ten days after the murder in Memphis, Mr. Garner did give permission to the members of the Atlanta FBI office to make a search of the premises there at his rooming house which had, the room which had subsequently been rented to the Defendant.

Mrs. Annie Peters would be called by the State to testify with reference to the operation of the Piedmont Laundry, which is located around the corner from Jimmy Garner's rooming house; that on April the 1st, the Defendant, as Eric Galt, left certain laundry and cleaning there; that on the morning of April the 5th, 1968, at around mid-morning, he returned and picked up this laundry and dry cleaning.

At that point those jurors who were observant realized that the prosecutor had taken them beyond the date of the murder. For the next twenty minutes Beasley spoke of the recovery of the white Mustang and of Ray's trip to Toronto, to London, to Portugal and his return to London where he was arrested by Detective Sgt. Phillip F. Brich of New Scotland Yard.

Toward the conclusion of his indictment of Ray the Assistant Attorney General offered the testimony of the FBI experts. He began with an assessment of the relevant fingerprints.

Mr. George J. Bonebrake, who has been working with fingerprints since 1941, would testify that at 5:15 A.M., April 5th, 1968, he received the following items as has been heretofore testified to; that is, the rifle, the items that, from the bag, that were delivered to him by the representative from the Memphis FBI office, with reference to this material from the front, recovered from the front of Canipe's Amusement place here, that he found a print of sufficient clarity, fingerprint of sufficient clarity on the rifle itself; he found another print of sufficient clarity for identification on the scope, the Redfield scope mounted on the rifle; he found a print on the after-shave bottle, which is in the little packet that was obtained or purchased from the Rexall Drug Store in Whitehaven, Tennessee, which was part of the items that we have heretofore mentioned to you. He found a print on the binoculars. He found a print on one of the Schlitz beer cans. He found a print on the front page of the April 4th issue of the Memphis Commercial Appeal. That on April the 17th he received this map of Mexico which was, the State would have shown, was obtained from the room, Jimmy Garner's rooming house in Atlanta; that he found prints of sufficient clarity on that map for identification purposes; that he started an extensive investigation through fugitive files consisting of some 53,000 fingerprint cards, and on April the 19th he identified all the above-mentioned prints that I have mentioned to you from these items as being identical with the records bearing the name and photograph of James Earl Ray.

An alert juror might have noticed that the State did not allege that Ray had left behind a fingerprint in the room that he had allegedly rented in the rooming house or in the bathroom from which the State alleged the shot had been fired.

Beasley then moved to what might have been the most difficult evidence for Ray to contend with. If the ballistics established that the bullet taken from Dr. King's body was fired from a rifle that had been purchased by Ray the case against him would begin to take shape. Beasley now spoke slowly and loudly, his voice emphasizing the importance of his words.

Mr. Robert A. Frazier, the chief, firearms identification unit at the FBI, with 27 years experience, would testify as to examination and firing of this rifle, 30.06, that has been heretofore introduced.

He examined the cartridges, the hull from the chamber of this rifle, the slug removed from the body of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and would testify as to his conclusions as follows:

The death slug was identical in all physical characteristics with the five loaded 30.06 Springfield cartridges found in the bag in front of Canipe's. The cartridge case had in fact been fired in this 30.06 rifle. That the death slug removed from the body contained land and groove impressions and direction of twist consistent with those that were in the barrel of this rifle.

This, to the jurors straining for the damning and conclusive evidence, to the reporters seeking, quite literally, the smoking gun, was the climax of the undefended case against James Earl Ray. His rifle had killed Dr. King.

Beasley then appeared to establish as fact that allegation yet again. He added that Frazier had also made microscopic comparison between the fresh dent in the sill of the window at the bathroom, 422½ South Main, and concluded that the microscopic evidence in this dent was consistent in all ways with the same microscopic marks as appear on the barrel of this rifle, 30.06 rifle.

The veteran lawyers in the courtroom smiled to themselves in much the same manner as professional magicians do when they observe an audience puzzled by a simple but well performed trick.

Moments later Beasley turned from the jury to Judge Battle and said, "If the Court please, that covers our stipulation."

This then was the case against James Earl Ray, fully and thoroughly presented by his prosecutors, and uninterrupted by his counsel and unrestrained by the rules of evidence.

Chapter Twenty-Three

THE DEFENSE

by Mark Lane

There is the truth. And there is the legal truth. It is not unusual for both truths to coincide. Yet the law, in its majesty, recognizes that this will not always be the case. The theoretical responsibility borne by the prosecution is to prove the guilt of the defendant, not by a fair preponderance of the evidence, but beyond a reasonable doubt. Therefore, continuing in a theoretical vein, a juror who was inclined to believe that the defendant was guilty—who had arrived at what was the truth for him but who was not convinced of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, would be obligated to vote for an acquittal.

For most Americans the technical problems confronting the prosecuting authorities in Memphis are of less concern than an examination of the facts which may lead to the truth. Yet those two areas of concern merge, entangle with one another, and make a clear understanding of the circumstances of the crime difficult to comprehend. It is because Ray pleaded guilty that the record of the crime is so barren. Had Ray been tried; certainly had he testified at the trial, the record would have been studded with, if not all or almost all of the relevant facts, a fair history of the events which had been tested in the crucible of cross-examination.

The search for the truth in this matter must, I believe, commence with an exploration of the anatomy of the guilty plea; its origin, its development, and the manner of its execution. In order to evaluate that bargained plea in the appropriate context it is necessary to assess the legal and technical validity of the case against Ray. For if he did kill Dr. King but the state was unable to prove that he did, then Ray is innocent under our understanding of the law. More important perhaps is the certain knowledge of the defendant and his attorney of this peculiar and marvelous dichotomy in our system of justice. In this chapter we will evaluate the viability of the case against Ray. If we conclude that the state could not have proved Ray's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt we will be constrained to examine his charge that his plea was improperly coerced.

Shortly after his arrest in England, Ray wrote to Arthur Hanes, Dr., the former mayor of Birmingham and F. Lee Bailey of Boston, requesting that they each consider representing him. Bailey declined and Hanes accepted. Bailey explained that his friendship with Dr. King created a conflict of interest which barred him from representing Ray. Hanes had successfully represented defendants in the highly-publicized murder of Viola Liuzzo, a civil rights worker who had been slain in the South. Apparently Ray had been aware of that defense and of Hanes' skill and his empathy with Southern jurors. He wrote to Hanes from London:

Dear Mr. Hanes,

I am writing this letter from London, England. I am being held here on a charge of passport fraud, also I think for Tenn. in the Martin King Case. I will probably be returned to the U.S. about June 17, and would like to know if you would consider appearing in my behalf? So far (three days) I have only been permitted to talk to police and also have not seen any papers except a headline today. By accident, stating I had given an interview to a Mr. Vinson, which is false. Most of the things that have been written in the papers about me I can only describe as silly. Naturally I would want you to investigate this nonsense before committing yourself. For these reasons and others which I won't go into I think it is important that I have an attorney upon arrival in Tenn. or I will be convicted of whatever charge they file on me before I arrive there. An English attorney came to see me today and said he would also write to you. I don't know your address is why I am sending this letter to the bar asso. The reason I wrote you is I read once where you handled a case similar to what I think may be filed on me also whatever the papers might say. I don't intend to give any interviews until I have consulted with an attorney. In the event you can not practice in Memphis would you contact an attorney their who would?

Sincerely

R. G. Sneyd

P.S. Among the many names they have me book under this one so if you should correspond use this one, address on envelope.

William Bradford Huie, an Alabama writer, almost immediately contacted Hanes and suggested that he would pay Ray a substantial sum for the exclusive rights to his story. Huie pointed out to Hanes that the sum could be used to pay lawyers' fees. Hanes left for England having decided both to represent Ray and to attempt to arrange a tri-party contract among himself, Ray, and Huie. Such a contract was agreed upon by the parties.

Hanes and his son, Arthur Hanes, Jr., diligently pursued leads, many of which were being developed by a private investigator, Renfro Hays.

I spent days at the Hanes law offices in Birmingham sorting through the voluminous investigative reports, trial briefs and working papers that the lawyers had prepared. They were kind enough to allow me to photocopy all those documents I considered to be relevant and I subsequently spent weeks studying that material. I also made available copies of that material to the Select Committee on Assassinations of the House of Representatives, with the permission of the Hanes law firm.

Interviews with the two lawyers and a thorough examination of their trial preparation work led me to conclude that they were ready for the trial. I began to defend against criminal prosecutions twenty-five years ago. In the course of hundreds of trials, including prosecutions for murder, manslaughter, conspiracy to overthrow the government, conspiracy to blow up the Statue of Liberty, the Washington Monument, and the Liberty Bell, and conspiracy to seize federal property at Wounded Knee, South Dakota, I have come to understand and cope with our system of justice and to respect the vagaries of the jury system. I understand as well, I believe, the special problems imparted to the defense in an unpopular case, especially when the difficulties are compounded by extensive and prejudicial pretrial publicity. After taking into account the unusual problems posed for this defense by extralegal considerations, I believe that the essential case against Ray was so flawed that it would have been difficult for the jury to have returned a verdict of guilty. Had the case been tried the state would have undertaken the responsibility of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that James Earl Ray fired a rifle from a bathroom window of a rooming house and that the bullet from that rifle struck and killed Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. This, I believe, the state could not do, partially due to the paucity of evidence linking Ray to the crime and partially due to the affirmative defense that had been established by the investigation conducted on his behalf.

Experienced trial lawyers know that there are no easy cases in which victory for either side is assumed in advance of trial. In cases involving capital punishment, as in this one, the awful possibility of the ultimate penalty tends to diminish feelings of ebullience that defense counsel might otherwise experience following multiple assessments of the evidence. Yet in spite of the highly prejudicial publicity surrounding the charges against the defendant, and in spite of the awesome potential should the defendant be convicted, Arthur Hanes, Sr., and his son and their client shared a quiet optimism and a cautious confidence. That confidence was threatened primarily by the defense lawyers' ever-present fear that the state might be holding some decisive evidence in reserve. In this case such fears were groundless. All the authorities knew and much of what they suspected had been offered to the media and commented on repeatedly.

The case against Ray, all that could be proven and in addition all that the state said could be proven—although on occasion it lacked the evidence to follow through on that boast—was presented by the authorities on March 10, 1969, and fully reflected in the previous chapter.

The witness who testified offered evidence that Dr. King had been killed on April 4, 1968, on the balcony of the Lorraine Motel from a shot fired from the general direction of a clump of trees and bushes at the rear of a rooming house beyond the vegetation.

A pathologist established that a bullet was taken from Dr. King's body and he offered a vague and, as we have seen, poorly based opinion as to the possible origin of the bullet. A police inspector told of a package found on South Main Street, two blocks from Dr. King's location at the Lorraine Motel balcony, and he described its contents. The FBI SAC in Memphis said that the package had been received by the Bureau later that day.

At that point the Memphis prosecutor abandoned the usual method of presenting important evidence through the testimony of witnesses and offered instead his own unsworn and sometimes unsupported allegations about what the evidence would show. This technique is regularly and properly utilized by prosecuting attorneys for the purpose of offering an opening statement but in the ordinary course of events such a statement is not construed as evidence and is followed by witnesses whose testimony is considered as evidence. Thus the jurors may test the allegations of the accuser against the testimony of the witnesses. In addition, of course, in an ordinary trial the witness is subjected to cross-examination, a device which often proves useful in arriving at the facts. In Memphis there was no cross-examination and for the most part the evidence was not offered through the testimony of witnesses.

To the uninitiated jurors and the reporters the nice distinctions and precise language of the law no doubt proved misleading. The prosecutor alleged that the FBI firearms expert with 27 years of experience "would testify" that the "the death slug (the bullet taken from Dr. King's body) was identified in all physical characteristics" with the cartridges found in the package in front of Canipe's. All that Frazier, the Bureau expert, had said was that both the bullet that killed King and the cartridges in the package were a common variety of 30.06 ammunition. That is not very dissimilar from a fingerprint expert testifying that the killer had ten fingers on two hands, five on each, and that the subject was similarly equipped. Then the prosecutor added that Frazier "would testify" that "the death slug removed from the body contained land and groove impressions and direction of twist consistent with those that were in the barrel of this (Ray's) rifle." To those without trial experience in assault and homicide cases, that allegation appeared conclusive or at least terribly damaging to Ray's claim that he had not killed Dr. King. Yet a knowledgeable defense lawyer would have welcomed that report and might have been tempted to call Frazier as a defense witness if the prosecution failed to call him as theirs.

As a bullet moves through a rifle barrel it spirals. Microscopic indentations which comprise the rifling inside the barrel cause that effect and remove particles from the jacket of the bullet. If the bullet is not substantially demolished a comparison with another bullet test-fired from the same weapon may yield conclusive results. The language of the government's firearms experts is standard, and their recitation is pro forma. In case after case the experts recite the conclusions that "my examination of this bullet proved beyond doubt that this bullet was fired from this weapon to the exclusion of all other weapons in the world." Any statement short of that one is considered to be valueless to the prosecution. In this case a substantial portion of the bullet remained intact. An expert who saw it but was not allowed to examine it under a microscope said that the bullet was sufficiently undamaged to permit a positive finding regarding the weapon from which it was fired. The failure of the state to prove that the "death slug" was fired from what was alleged to be Ray's rifle reflected very poorly upon the case against Ray.

The prosecutor sought to overcome this essential weakness in the case by stretching Frazier's identification of the mark on the bathroom window sill. Beasley said that Frazier would testify that the dent on the window sill "was consistent in all ways" with the marks on what was alleged to be Ray's rifle. No doubt, had Frazier been subjected to cross-examination he would have conceded that what he meant was that any metal object similar to the rifle barrel in question could have caused the dent. His refusal to inform the state that "Ray's" rifle did cause the dent meant that the state could neither prove that the rifle fired the bullet that killed Dr. King nor that it had been in the rooming house from where the shot was allegedly fired. Beasley's indications to the contrary may have been useful to obfuscate the record and mislead the jurors and the press in 1969, but upon sober reflection and in the context of the evidence now available his comments appear to have been a somewhat desperate prosecutorial effort to give the impression that there was a substantial case when in fact there was not.

If the state could not prove that the rifle fired the shot or that it had even been in the bathroom or elsewhere in the rooming house, the evidence that seemed to establish Ray's ownership of the rifle was rendered almost worthless. I believe that the state could have proven that Ray purchased the rifle from the Aeromarine Supply Company in Birmingham. Further, Ray told me that he had done so. Yet even if that weapon was judged to be the murder weapon by competent experts, proof of Ray's guilt would depend upon additional factors. Proof of ownership of a weapon employed in a murder case does not establish the owner as a criminal. In this case the state could not even establish any links between the defendant, James Earl Ray and the weapon from which it was fired.

The state claimed that it could prove that Ray had been in the rooming house before the murder, during the murder, and immediately after the murder. For those assertions Beasley relied upon statements which he said were made by eyewitnesses. It is interesting to note that as the mythology of the case against Ray developed it became conventional wisdom to allege that Ray left fingerprints and palm prints around the rooming house. William Bradford Huie, whose book, He Slew the Dreamer, is discussed in chapter 26 told Ray that his prints were found in room 5 and in the bathroom. This inclined Ray to believe that his defense would be more difficult than he had conceived. In his book Huie wrote:

Part of the time between 4:30 and 6:01 p.m. Ray watched for Dr. King leaning out of the window of room 5. Evidence of this comes from finger prints and from the fact that, after the murder, a chair and table were found to have been moved to the window.

Huie added that "a print of the heel of his (Ray's) palm was found on the bathroom wall." Huie informed Percy Foreman, Ray's lawyer, of his discovery and later Foreman declared in an article he wrote in Look magazine in April 1969 that Ray had left behind both fingerprints and palm prints and that he, Foreman, knew why. Foreman wrote, "he wanted to escape, but he didn't want to lose credit. As further precaution against such dreaded loss, he left his fingerprints in the side room that he had rented, and his palm print in the bathroom from which he fired the shot."

Huie, Foreman, and the many representatives of the news media who relied upon them for the facts, were wrong. The prosecution did not charge that Ray's fingerprints or palm prints had been found in the rooming house. At the outset, the Memphis police alleged that the shot had been fired from the bathroom window and that the killer had left scuff marks in the bathtub and a palm print on the wall over the tub. Captain Dewell Ray of the Internal Security Division of the Memphis Police Department and Sergeant Jim Papia discovered the palm print soon after the shot had been fired. Later, under the direction of Inspector Zachary, the chief of homicide, the palm print was dusted and examined. Fingerprints in room 5 were also dusted and examined. Subsequently the state concluded that neither the fingerprints in room 5 nor the palm print in the bathroom were left behind by Ray. On March 10 the prosecution made an apparent and deliberate effort to avoid the question. While Beasley considerably stretched, not to say entirely deformed, the statements of eyewitnesses in order to prove that Ray had been in the rooming house, he abandoned any effort to link either the fingerprints in room 5 or the palm prints in the bathroom to Ray. Yet if the scuff marks in the tub and the palm print on the wall were evidence left behind by the killer, as the police had previously charged, it might be useful to discover whose hand matched the print. If the police did make such a determination they declined to reveal it.

With Ray's attorney and his biographer going far beyond the prosecutor and the evidence in their zeal to prove his guilt while the facts indicated that the case against Ray was largely conjectural, his hopes for an adequate defense diminished.

As we have seen, Beasley relied to a considerable extent upon Mrs. Bessie Brewer, the manager of the rooming house, to establish Ray's presence in the rooming house before the shot was fired and he relied upon her entirely for his assertion that Ray, using the name John Willard, requested a room for a week. Beasley said that the state would prove, through Mrs. Brewer, that Ray had entered the rooming house "between 3:00 and 3:10 P.M. in the afternoon" and that "the defendant appeared here at Mrs. Brewer's office or apartment." Yet Mrs. Brewer never made such a statement. Mrs. Brewer consistently refused to identify Ray as the man she rented the room to and as the man who used the name John Willard. She refused to make any such statement, written or verbal, in spite of the pressure upon her to do so. As Beasley, the Assistant Attorney General, made those declarations to the jury and to the press, Phil Canale, the Attorney General, sat at the prosecution table.

Years later, Pamela Spack and Leona Zanetti, two researchers for the Citizens Commission of Inquiry, interviewed Canale. Canale admitted then that Mrs. Brewer had never identified Ray. He said, "Mrs. Brewer did not positively identify Ray as being the Willard who had checked in there. She said she said she never looked him full in the face or anything like that. That was her testimony."

The state alleged that only one other witness could place Ray in the rooming house. According to Beasley, Charles Q. Stephens, a resident of the rooming house, heard the shot and went "out into the corridor in time to see the left profile of the defendant as he turned down this passageway." But Stephens did not make a positive identification of Ray. He only said the man looked "very much like" an FBI picture of Ray. That modest assertion was challenged by other statements, including earlier statements made by Stephens himself.

Approximately one week after Dr. King was killed I visited Stephens in the room which he shared with Grace Stephens, his wife. At that time he told me that he had seen the man who fled from the bathroom just after the shot was fired. He said that the man was "very small, quite short and certainly not heavy." He also told me that he had been the primary source for the artist's portrait of the presumed killer which was at that time being circulated by law enforcement authorities. Ray is five feet, ten inches tall and in no manner resembles the artist's drawing. At that time I was unable to ask Stephens directly if the man who fled after the shot was fired was James Earl Ray, since Ray was not a police suspect then, and his name was not known. After Ray was apprehended I sought to question Stephens again but by then Stephens had been placed in jail by the Memphis authorities and held as a material witness. Canale explained why Stephens had been held: "He had a reputation for being an alcoholic and he frequented places that we thought if somebody had it in their mind to harm him they could." Although Pamela Spack and Leona Zanetti pressed Canale for an explanation, he could think of no other. He added only, "So we talked to him and his lawyer about putting him in protective custody, which he agreed to; then later on he got tired of sitting over at the jail and requested that he be released and he was." Canale added that "we were worried to some extent about his personal safety and we considered he was a material witness in the case although I think we could have presented the case adequately without him."

However, Canale did not tell the court in 1969 that Stephens was an alcoholic who should be imprisoned for his own protection. He filed an affidavit with Judge Battle in which he swore that he was concerned that Stephens "might leave the state and not testify." Based upon that affidavit Stephens was held involuntarily in prison under a $10,000 bond. The record reveals that Stephens did ask to be released on numerous occasions but that Canale refused. Stephens finally secured counsel and brought a writ of habeas corpus before a judge other than Battle. Judge William W. O'Hearn ruled that the incarceration of Stephens was "illegal" ordered him to be freed at once. In contesting that ruling Beasley argued that the prosecution has no other witnesses who can "testify the same material facts."

For two weeks before Stephens had been placed in jail police officers had been assigned to be with him all day and night. As soon as he was released the officers began to accompany him again around the clock. Canale later admitted that no one had ever threatened Stephens in any way. In retrospect it appears that the Memphis authorities were less concerned about protecting their witness from harm than they were about protecting him from interviews, particularly with the team of defense lawyers and their investigator.

Stephens was a disabled veteran with a severe drinking problem. Apparently he was drunk when the shot that killed Dr. King was fired. His wife told me in the week following the assassination that "Charlie didn't see anything. He couldn't have. He was on the bed trying to sleep one off." That statement received independent corroboration from James M. McCraw. The month before the plea of guilty was entered by Ray two investigators questioned McCraw. They prepared a rather odd document entitled "Statement of James M. McCraw" in which McCraw began speaking in the first person and then was referred to in the third person. The document, in its entirety, reads as follows:

On April 4, 1968, I was driving for Yellow Cab Co. and was dispatched to 422½ So. Main St. to pick up a fare. When I arrived at this address, I double parked as there were cars and trucks parked at the curb. I observed a Cadillac auto, owned by Mr. Jones, owner of Jim's grill on So. Main, 526-9910. I also observed two white Mustangs parked at the curb and several delivery trucks. All of this traffic was parked on the East side of So. Main St. facing North. A woman who ran the rooming house directed Mr. McCraw to a certain room, stating that the occupant of that room directed that a cab be called. The door of the room was open and McCraw went in the room and found Charles Stephens lying on the bed fully clothed, he was in a very drunken condition. Stephens was well-known to McCraw, as he had picked him up many times before. Mr. McCraw refused to transport Stephens as a fare because of his drunken condition. McCraw stated that Stephens could not get off the bed. Mr. McCraw left the rooming house, got back into his cab, made a U-turn went North on South Main St. When Mr. McCraw got to the corner of So. Main and Calhoun St. the dispatcher said that Mr. M. L. King had been shot and for all cabs to stay out of the So. Main. area. Mr. McCraw, after he got back into his cab, received a call to Frankie and Johnny's Boat Store on the Mississippi River at the Bridge. Mr. McCraw estimates that he was in the rooming house about three minutes and that from the time he left the rooming house until the time the dispatcher called about King being shot was about three minutes.

McCraw has driven Stephens to many liquor stores through the city at many different times. Stephens drank all kinds of whiskey or beer. Mr. McCraw could not tell whether Stephens drank more on the first and fifteenth of the month as he (Stephens) was a heavy drinker at all times.

McCraw's statement, ignored by Beasley when he ostensibly presented the facts in the case to the jury, provides strong support for Grace Stephen's earlier comment to me. The gravamen of the declaration made by the taxi driver is that Stephens, the only man who the state said could identify Ray as the fleeing gunman, was drunk on his bed two to five minutes before Dr. King was killed. The statement, of course, also raised the question of not one but two white Mustangs in front of the rooming house entrance.

Lloyd Jowers, the proprietor of Jim's Grill, located on the street level floor of the rooming house, was interviewed by Memphis police authorities on February 6, 1969 at four o'clock in the afternoon. Almost a year had passed since the murder and the state was making its last-minute preparations for the trial. Jowers, who was to be a prosecution witness, told two police investigators, according to their written statement, that:

"Charlie Stephens was drunk on April 4, 1968 in the afternoon." The police report added that Jowers "remembers because Stephens and his landlady were having trouble about Stephen's tent."

Thus further corroboration for Mrs. Stephen's statement was available to the police and prosecution, although not at this time to the defense.

At this point the state's case against Ray crumbled. There was no reliable evidence that placed Ray in the rooming house at any time. No reliable witness would testify to his presence there before the shot was fired. The only witness who on occasion identified Ray as the man who fled through the corridor, and who had previously described a different man in size and facial characteristics, was evidently too drunk to observe the culprit and could not have seen him from his position on the bed, in any event. No fingerprints or palm prints placed Ray in the rooming house and indeed those that were located seemed to point in another direction which evidently was not explored by the police. No evidence demonstrated that Ray's rifle had fired the bullet which struck Dr. King and there, too, the evidence appeared to point in another direction which evidently was also not explored by the police.

Although neither Beasley nor Canale mentioned her, Grace Stephens was an important witness. She was sober on the afternoon of April 4, 1968, and she was in her room at the rooming house. She heard the shot. She said, "At about six o'clock I heard a shot. I cannot tell where the shot came from. I know it echoed in the arcade beneath my window."

She said, "Right after the shot a man left the bathroom and went down the hall and down the steps to Main Street. I saw the man as he passed the door of my room. My guess of this man's age was in his fifties. This man was not quite as tall as I am. He was small-boned built. He had on an Army-colored hunting jacket unfastened and dark pants." She said that the man also wore a "plaid sport shirt." The man, Mrs. Stephens said, had "salt and pepper colored hair." She added, "He had something long in his right hand but I cannot swear what it was." She said that she heard "screaming at the motel" and that later reporters came to their room. Police officers did not visit her room for four hours. When they did arrive, she said, she accompanied them to Police Headquarters where she gave a statement to Inspector Zachary.

At last the Memphis authorities apparently had uncovered a reliable witness. Yet when Ray was arrested her statement was inconvenient. Ray was taller than average and Mrs. Stephens described a man approximately five feet, five inches tall. Ray was well-built and muscular and she described a small-boned man. Ray was in his thirties and she described a man twenty years older.

While Charles Stephens was illegally held in jail by Memphis authorities, Grace Stephens was illegally taken from her home by other Memphis authorities and placed in a mental institution. Tennessee law requires that a commitment proceeding be initiated by a relative, guardian, licensed physician, or the director of a health and welfare institution. The proceeding against Mrs. Stephens was initiated by an assistant administrator at a hospital in Memphis. While the law required that the subject be notified in writing by mail of the proposed commitment hearing, that was not done in this case. Notice was not given to relatives as required by law. After Mrs. Stephens was illegally placed in the mental institution, the Memphis prosecutors removed her records from the hospital, according to her lawyer, C. M. Murphy.

Murphy also charged that his client had no history of mental illness and that she was able to care for herself. He said that the Memphis prosecuting attorneys committed her to safeguard their case against Ray. While one of the two prosecutors denied the allegation, he said that he did not know who really was behind the effort to commit her. Murphy said that

The reason she was placed in the psychiatric hospital was because her testimony would have been unfavorable to the position taken by the Shelby County attorney general (Memphis prosecutor) and his staff.

She was not mentally ill at the time and has at no time since been mentally ill. She charges further that although she was a material witness and that she informed the Memphis police . . . as to the details of her knowledge, such information was deliberately concealed . . . and she was unlawfully shuffled off to the psychiatric department of the city of Memphis' hospitals.

In 1970, two years after Mrs. Stephens was committed, Murphy brought an action for her release. A reporter for the Washington Post who attended the hearing said that Mrs. Stephens, "was heavily sedated" and that she "stared blankly." He reported as well that "attorneys say that ordinarily she is bright, articulate, and reads a great deal and that she completed three years of college."

Murphy was struck by the evident deterioration of his client. He said that a doctor at the mental institution had said in January 1969, two months before the Ray case came to trial, that her condition did not warrant commitment and that she should be released. Despite the evaluation by the institution's psychiatrist that her condition would "decline and deteriorate" if she was not released at the time of the evaluation in 1969, she was not released and she remains at the institution now, almost a decade after her incarceration.

Charles Stephens originally offered evidence which cast doubt upon the State's case against Ray. He was incarcerated and was released after he recanted. Mrs. Stephens has not recanted. When she was visited at the institution where she is confined she was asked if she remembers what she saw on April 4, 1968. She answered with a sad smile, "Oh yes. I remember what I saw and who I saw run away. That's why I'm here, you know."

The tragedy of April 4, 1968 apparently did not end that day.

Chapter Twenty-four

THE AFFIRMATIVE CASE

by Mark Lane

The defendant in a criminal case need not offer any evidence. He need not testify. The jurors may not draw any conclusion from his failure to testify. The defendant is not obligated to offer an alibi or an affirmative defense. He need not present the testimony of a single witness. The defendant may rest secure that if the state fails to prove his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt the jury will acquit him.

It is generally advisable for defendants and their attorneys to remind the jury of these components that comprise the presumption of innocence and then to place no reliance upon such shibboleths for in all probability the jurors will not.

While the state was unable to prove that Ray was in the rooming house, that he had fired a weapon from, or even that the weapon which he had purchased fired the shot which killed Dr. King, curious jurors might be interested in trying to comprehend his strange behavior.

Ray had purchased the rifle in Birmingham under an assumed name. He had purchased binoculars shortly before Dr. King was killed and both the rifle and the binoculars and other articles were tossed to the sidewalk near the entrance to the rooming house within minutes of the firing of a rifle. Ray had registered at the Rebel Motel the previous night using a pseudonym. And Ray had traveled by automobile from Los Angeles to New Orleans and from Canada to Mexico. He appeared to have no legal and visible means of support.

Had there been a trial the defense might have forced a dilemma. If the charge against Ray had not been dismissed by the trial judge after the presentation of the prosecution's case, the defense would have been constrained to determine whether Ray should testify. Very likely Battle, given his disposition to convict, would not have granted a defense motion based upon the failure of the state to present a prima facie case. While such a motion perhaps merited a serious hearing it seems doubtful, in a case of this magnitude, that it might be considered by the court. Through the cross-examination of the prosecution witnesses the defense in all probability would have established in the minds of the jurors that the overblown promises made by Beasley could not be sustained by evidence. A well-planned defense seeks to answer the questions that remain for the jurors when a prosecution case dissolves. Although it is not necessary for jurors to have a reasonable alternative theory of the crime presented to them in order to acquit, indeed it is contrary to law even to suggest that the defense has such a burden, it is generally helpful for the defense to suggest that the crime may have been committed in another way. Similarly while the defendant need not explain where he was when the crime was committed—it theoretically being sufficient for the finding of innocence that the state be unable to prove that he was an activist at the scene of the crime at the appropriate moment—if the defendant can make a showing as to his actual whereabouts without jeopardizing his legal defense it is often useful to do so.

After talking with the relevant witnesses and after reading interview reports and official records comprising the entire defense and prosecution cases, I am convinced that the state was not prepared to prove that Ray was in the rooming house on April 4, 1968. I am equally convinced that he was there shortly before Dr. King was killed. Ray, himself, told me that he had been in the rooming house earlier in the day and that he had in fact registered that day. He told me "I signed the name John Willard in the registration book. I was really amazed when the prosecutor never mentioned that at the mini-trial. They said that the registration book was lost."

It is difficult to imagine how the registration book, an important, almost an essential document in the case against Ray, could have disappeared. The police were at the rooming house within minutes after the shot was fired and questioned the occupants of the house shortly thereafter. They were seeking information about who had occupied the various rooms that day. The registration book was an obvious prime target of their search. Ray's handwritten registration was the only evidence that the state could use to prove his presence there. Yes the prosecuting authorities made no reference to that document and relied upon poor Mr. Stephens instead.

I asked Ray if he could understand the disappearance of the book. He said, "I don't know for sure but I can guess that maybe there is something else in that book, perhaps someone else who registered, that they don't want anyone to know about. It would have to be something important for them to give up the only evidence that could prove I was in that rooming house."

Ray's narrative of the events that led to the murder of Dr. King involve him in the commission of a number of crimes. If he admitted in court that he had committed those crimes he might have been prosecuted and the cumulative penalties that could be invoked against him for those crimes, when added to the penalty for the crime of escaping from jail and then added to the time that he owed the State of Missouri at the time of his escape, might have kept him in jail for the rest of his life. Yet Ray was anxious to testify at his trial in order to deny that he shot King or even knew that King would be shot. His attorneys, who were confident that Ray would be acquitted, were reluctant to place him on the stand.

Ray did testify in an action that he subsequently brought against Foreman, Huie, and Hanes, Sr. On that occasion he testified that he had not fired the shot that killed Dr. King. Ray was willing to accept the risk that he might be required to spend a substantial portion of his life in jail for the opportunity to explain how he was used, without his knowledge, by those who murdered Dr. King. It is in this light that one must examine the statements by Huie and Foreman that Ray wanted to be caught so that he could proclaim that he murdered King. All three said that Ray's glory was in letting the whole world know of his guilt. Yet, as we have seen, Ray has insisted that he was innocent, denied that he shot King, and proclaimed himself to be an inglorious and unwitting dupe of others.

Ray's explanation to me of his movements through the United States from Canada to Mexico, his purchase of a rifle in Birmingham and a pair of binoculars in Memphis, and ultimately his presence in Memphis on April 4th in the vicinity of the murder scene is either basically true, or the intricate and comprehensive work product of a brilliant mind. For the narrative explains in a cohesive fashion all of Ray's otherwise inexplicable actions. Ray's relationship with a man he refers to only as Raoul becomes the Rosetta Stone of the defendant's odyssey.

According to Ray he fled to Canada after escaping from the Missouri penitentiary in Jefferson City. While in Montreal, he said, he "let the word get around" in the Neptune Tavern, a bar that welcomed seamen, that he had been in trouble in the United States and that he was seeking identification papers and money. Ray made it plain that he had been involved in criminal activities and was willing to undertake similar low-risk activities if his needs could be met. According to Ray a man he subsequently referred to as Raoul approached him and indicated that he could provide adequate documents and sufficient funds if Ray helped him to accomplish various projects. After a series of meetings Ray said the two men reached an agreement.

In furtherance of that agreement Ray began to surreptitiously deliver articles across the border from Canada to the United States and from the United States to Mexico. Ray was not told, and he states that he did not ask, about the contents of the packages. He, of course, presumed that he was smuggling contraband from one country to another.

Ray said that for one episode Raoul paid him $3,000 in cash. According to Ray, Raoul suggested that he go to Alabama from Montreal. "I didn't want to go back to the United States," Ray said to me. "Raoul told me he operated out of New Orleans and that he wanted me to help him in that area. He said I should go to a place near New Orleans and he suggested Mobile." According to Ray he chose Birmingham over Mobile because "I'm allergic to salt air." He added, "When you're living underground a bigger city is safer than a smaller one and Birmingham is bigger than Mobile." Raoul told Ray to buy a car in Birmingham.

In September 1968, Ray wrote, "I suppose I became involved in the plot to kill King when I took those packages into the United States from Canada. I would think it had all been decided before the car was bought in Birmingham, as no one would have given me $3,000 in Birmingham just to haul narcotics across the border. But nobody told me about any planned murder of King or anyone else." Subsequently Raoul arranged for Ray to drive his white Mustang into Mexico after Raoul had exchanged the spare tire in the Mustang for another one. After Ray had cleared Mexican customs Ray's tire was returned by Raoul who removed the one that Ray had driven across the border. "I never thought I was smuggling a spare tire," Ray told me later. "Obviously something was in the tire."

Ray said to me that Raoul gave him $2,000 in cash for that episode. "It was all in twenty-dollar bills. And he said he would have $12,000 more for me to go into a business within another country and he would also have a passport for me." Ray told me that Raoul said "he would probably need me in about two or three or four months. This was in October 1967. He said I should call him at his New Orleans telephone number once in a while. I told him that I would be in Los Angeles and he said that he would write to me there."

Ray said that approximately four months before Dr. King was killed he returned to New Orleans to meet Raoul in a tavern on Canal Street on the border of the French Quarter. At that time Raoul told Ray that he would have a job for him to do in about three months and that it was to be Ray's last assignment. "He told me that when that job was done he was going to give me $12,000 and all the documents that I would need to travel wherever I wanted to outside of the States. He wouldn't tell me what the job was, told me not to ask about it, and gave me $500 in cash," Ray said.

Ray told me that subsequently Raoul contacted him and told him to meet him in New Orleans on March 20, 1968, less than two months before King was killed. When Ray arrived in New Orleans he said he was told that Raoul had gone to Birmingham and that he expected Ray to meet him there in two days. Ray arrived a day late in Birmingham since he became confused and took a highway to Montgomery by mistake.

Raoul and Ray traveled to Atlanta together. There, according to Ray, Raoul "told me that he wanted me to buy a large-bore deer rifle with a telescopic sight. He said that if the rifle was approved of by the buyers that I was to get about a dozen more and also about 200 cheap rifles. The good one had to be new, the others they didn't care about."

Ray said that since he had Alabama identification it might be better if he went back to Birmingham to buy the rifles. Raoul agreed. Ray said, "We met in Birmingham and Raoul and I got the address of a rifle place, Aeromarine Supply out of a newspaper advertisement, which said they had a lot of rifles." According to Ray, Raoul gave him about $750 and told him to buy the large-bore deer rifle. Ray purchased a rifle and showed it to Raoul in a Birmingham motel. He said Raoul was displeased—"said it was the wrong kind." Raoul pointed out to Ray the rifle that he preferred from the catalogue and Ray called the store and said that he wanted to exchange it. Ray exchanged rifles. Raoul told him, he said, to meet him "in Memphis on April 3 in the evening at the Rebel Motel and to bring the rifle." Ray said that he did meet Raoul as planned and that he was told that he was to go back to Birmingham in a few days to purchase some more rifles and "a lot of cheap foreign rifles so that they could be shipped to New Orleans. Ray said that "before he left he said I should meet him the next day at four o'clock in the afternoon at a rooming house at 422½ South Main Street. He wrote down the address and said to meet him in the bar downstairs if he was not in the rooming house." Ray said that he met Raoul in Jim's Grill on the Afternoon of April 4, 1968, and that subsequently they went together to a room in the rooming house. "When we got there Raoul said we would be there for a few days 'so bring the Mustang around and get your stuff out of it and bring it up here.' He also said to get a pair of infrared binoculars at York Arms, a store that was nearby." Ray did purchase binoculars but the sales clerk told him that the store did not carry the infrared variety.

Ray said that when he returned to the rooming house he brought his suitcase to the room. "I also brought the bed spread from the car since I was going to have to sleep in the room for a few days."

Quite obviously Ray's location at the time the shot was fired remains the single most important question in considering the case against him. It has been pointed out that he has vacillated when asked to establish that locale. Ray conceded the accuracy of that accusation when I inquired and now he explained it this way. As in the case with much of the evidence, this matter has neither been tested by cross-examination nor has it been offered in a courtroom under oath.

"I wanted to testify at the trial. Lawyers can say and the judges can agree that if you don't testify it can't be held against you. But jurors want to see you. They want to hear the defendant talk. I didn't kill King and I wanted to testify. [REDACTED] Toward the end of our arrangement, when it was breaking down, old man Hanes came in to see me. He said, 'Huie wants to know where you were when King was shot.' I was surprised that Huie didn't ask me long before. I might have told him then. [REDACTED] I said, 'Tell Huie it could have happened this way.' Then I told him a story about me waiting in the car, Raoul running down the steps and jumping in the back seat of the car. I said 'Tell Huie that Raoul pulled a sheet over him in the back seat.' I mentioned a sheet because Huie is so interested in the Klan I thought he would appreciate it. It never happened that way at all. The next morning young Hanes came in to see me. He said Huie is mad. 'He doesn't want to know how it could have happened, he wants to know how it did happen.' I just sort of smiled. I wasn't going to give away my testimony to the other side in advance."

I asked Ray if he would tell me where he was when Dr. King was murdered.

"Yes, I'll tell you. It looks now as if I may not get a trial at all so I'll tell you what happened."

Our conversation took place in the library of the Brushy Mountain Penitentiary. I was the first visitor to see him after the United States Supreme Court had denied his application for a trial.

He said, "I was sent out of the rooming house eight or ten times that day. I was almost never in there. As to the bathroom I'm not sure I was ever in there at all. It had no special meaning for me at the time. But I was in and out of the room I had rented all day—mostly out of it."

I asked why his fingerprints had not been found in the room. "Well," he said, "the doors did not have door knobs for one thing. They had a hole to stick a finger through and a leather strap to pull."

Ray returned to the narrative. "I was sent to the drugstore, to the gun shop, twice to the place that sold binoculars, to taverns. Late afternoon I was sent to a gas station to check out the car, to get air in the spare tire. I did that and drove back toward the rooming house on South Main. The place was filled with police, blocking off the street. Something had happened and I knew I had to get out of there. I was a fugitive and I could not afford to get stopped by the police. I turned down a street before the rooming house and started to drive away. I was later told that a police officer waved me on through but I don't remember that happening."

I asked Ray where he went. He said, "I began to drive toward New Orleans. I had the car radio on and the announcement came that King had been shot. It was dark by then. Maybe about seven o'clock when I heard that news. But even then I wasn't sure about what had happened. I didn't even know that the Lorraine Motel was behind the rooming house. I didn't know that King was staying there. I didn't even know that King was in town."

I asked Ray when he determined for the first time that he had some involvement with the events that led to Dr. King's death. "Well, I kept on driving and then the news report came over the radio about King being shot and the suspect, a white man, had escaped from the area in a white Mustang. I was driving a white Mustang. I had just left the area. It wasn't hard at that time for me to put two and two together and decide that I was it." Ray said, "Then I just wanted to get far away from Memphis. I had good reasons to leave. I wanted to get away from the police. A convict, a fugitive wanted for killing King. I didn't think I had a chance. Anyway, even if I did I still owed time to Missouri and there would be the additional time for escaping. I had to get away before I was caught by the police or anyone else."

According to Arthur Hanes, Jr., Ray was fleeing for his life. "He knew all of a sudden that he was in deep trouble. I think it was not just the authorities Ray feared. He was afraid that Raoul or Raoul's friends might kill him. He knew by then, of course, that he'd been set up and he feared that as an important link to the killers he imposed a real threat. He was afraid that they would kill him."

Certain elements of Ray's explanation of the events are subject to independent verification. I have been able to establish that Ray had been at the motels and restaurants that he spoke of and that he was there during the time frame that he gave. Yet those facts do not establish the validity of his essential claim that another was involved and directed him. Ray could have woven the fabric of his conspiracy story around the framework of a real set of facts. There are, I suggest, three areas of inquiry which might tend to confirm or challenge the essence of his story.

Did he exchange rifles at the Aeromarine Supply Company after conferring with another as he claimed?

Was the package containing evidence that would inexorably lead to him left on the sidewalk rather than placed in the Mustang?

If Raoul was not a source of substantial funding for Ray during his months as a fugitive, what was the source?

There has been speculation about how Ray's trips around the country and his trips to Europe were financed. Novelists have offered theories. The FBI conducted a relatively thorough investigation and was unable to establish any proof that Ray had been financed from the time of his escape from the prison at Jefferson City, Missouri, until the time of his arrest in London in any fashion other than Raoul, as Ray claimed. If Ray did receive substantial funds from other sources, those sources have escaped detection.

The troubling presence of the package containing evidence tending to link Ray to the crime creates a serious logical problem. If Ray acted alone, used the weapon that he purchased in Birmingham, and then was motivated to flee quickly from the scene, why did he take the time to pack the weapon in a cardboard box and then place his bulky belongings in a bedspread? Indeed, who had he not left the articles not required to kill Dr. King in the trunk of the Mustang before he fired the shot? If he was going to carry the rifle, binoculars, radio, clothing, and other articles from the bathroom, taking precious time to wrap them up, why did he leave them on the sidewalk? Why did he not just throw them in the Mustang parked a few feet away? The gratuitous placement by Ray of evidence that would, without doubt, lead to him is inexplicable. Ray's narrative of the events has the virtue of offering a rational explanation.

If Ray had discussed the characteristics of the rifle that he had purchased from the Aeromarine Supply Company with another who considered it to be unsuitable for the intended use, and then Ray exchanged the rifle for a more accurate or more powerful weapon, his narrative takes on an added authority. It is sometimes necessary for a juror to enter the mind of a defendant to determine if his testimony meets the crucial test of reasonableness. Since you, the reader, may be the only jury that James Earl Ray will ever have, an examination by you of his mental process at the time of purchase of the presumed murder weapon is important. Does it not seem likely that had Ray purchased the rifle with the intent of using it to murder Dr. King that he would have decided upon the weapon in advance of entering the store in order to spend as little time as possible with the store personnel? According to the state's hypothesis, the first overt act that Ray committed in his solitary plan to kill Dr. King was the purchase of a suitable weapon. Would Ray have not sought to complete that task expeditiously so that the salesperson might be less likely to identify him subsequently? Yet Ray, for some reason, did return to the Aeromarine Supply Company to exchange the weapon for a much more powerful and accurate one. Ray has told us of his view of the transaction with the Aeromarine Supply Company in Birmingham. Robert Wood and Donald Wood were the proprietors of the company on March 29, 1968. According to Donald Wood, on that day Ray told him he was going deer hunting with his brother and that he needed a rifle for that purpose. Ray later recalled that he had said he was to hunt deer with "my brother-in-law." With the exception of that discrepancy, Wood fully corroborates Ray's narrative and provides, as well, details which tend to confirm essential elements in the narrative. Wood said that Ray looked over a number of rifles, seemed confused by the array of rifles available, and appeared to know even less about deer hunting. Ray selected a Remington Gamenaster. Wood affixed a telescopic sight to the .243 caliber weapon while Ray waited.

During the afternoon, Wood received a telephone call from Ray. Ray said that he required a "heavier gun" and that he wanted to exchange the weapon he had just purchased for a more powerful one. Wood agreed. He was, however, puzzled since the weapon he'd sold earlier in the day was more than adequate for deer hunting. Wood pointed out that he would prefer to make the exchange the next day when he would have time to mount the telescopic sight on the weapon he purchased. Ray agreed.

Wood said that Ray returned the following morning and chose a more powerful weapon, a Remington 30.06 rifle which fired a bullet that weighed approximately as much as the bullet for the .243 Remington.

Ray's account of the transaction at Aeromarine was confirmed both by Donald Wood and his father Robert Wood. Only the mysterious Raoul can corroborate or challenge Ray's account of why he exchanged weapons and risked a second visit to the location of his first overt act in the murder of Dr. King. We are left to ponder this question—Why did Ray exchange rifles unless someone advised him to do so after he had made the initial purchase?

Ray's explanation, whether truthful or not, claims the virtue of being reasonable. It also enjoys another distinction. During the nine years that have passed since that day it remains the only explanation of the prolonged transaction.

In-depth interviews with potential witnesses, an examination of all of the voluminous working papers prepared by the original defense lawyers and their investigation, and days spent with Hanes senior and junior provided me with some insight into what might have been the affirmative case for the defense even had Ray not testified.

Arthur Hanes, Jr., a Princeton graduate and a sophisticated and urbane young Birmingham trial lawyer in 1968, told me what all trial lawyers know. "Hell, it wasn't our job to find out who killed King. We were there to defend Ray." This is the credo of the trial lawyer and it is, I suggest, an entirely proper approach when the role of the defense lawyer is examined in context. Students of history may be appalled by what may appear to be, and by what in fact may be, a cavalier attitude toward the facts. Yet, since historical truth is arrived at in one fashion and justice in the courtroom in another, the obligation of those who participate in a search for the truth is quite different from the responsibility of participants in the search for justice. The judicial experience as we practice it relies theoretically upon an impartial and wise judge, an impartial and open-minded jury, a state devoted to the discovery of evidence demonstrating the guilt of the defendant, and a defense dedicated to refuting that case. Should the defense lawyer abandon his traditional role and strike out on his own to learn and reveal the "truth," the delicate balance devised to create a fair and equal contest fails. It is for others to explore the facts to discover the truth. The suitable defense lawyer is an advocate for his client's case. It is in this light that the case, as seen and presented by the defense lawyers, should be understood.

Had Ray been tried, very likely the defense would have offered a serious challenge to several elements of the state's case. The jurors would have been required to determine if the shot was fired from the bathroom window; when and by whom the package that seemed to incriminate Ray was placed on the sidewalk; whether there was a deliberate police effort to allow Ray to escape from the scene; if the FBI deliberately allowed Ray to escape from the country before advertising their interest with him; why Ray's prints were not found in the bathroom; whether the bullet that killed Dr. King came from the rifle Ray had purchased; could the state prove that Ray had pulled the trigger that resulted in the fatal wound.

Among the most intriguing questions presented by the case against Ray as the lone killer are those that flow from the presumption that Ray rented a room at 422½ South Main in order to have a clear shot at Dr. King. Dr. King had not stayed at the Lorraine during his most recent visits to Memphis prior to April 1968. While the FBI had, since March 29, 1968, sought to drive King into that motel, Ray, presumably, would not have been aware of those efforts.

The prosecution alleges that once Ray learned that King was to be at the Lorraine it was obvious that a room at 422½ South Main would provide the perfect sniper's nest. In retrospect the casual observer might agree. However, an examination of the area either from the balcony at the Lorraine or from South Main Street reveals the true complexity created by the geography and topography of the site. From the Lorraine Motel balcony, it is not possible to see the building at 422½ Main Street. The rear of the building facing the Lorraine is entirely hidden by trees and bushes. From the Lorraine, one cannot even know that 422½ exists. The perspective afforded by an examination from South Main Street of the buildings located there does not reveal that by entering the 422½ address one will be able to see the Lorraine. A person familiar with the inner structure of the buildings might know that by entering 422½ and passing through a jerry-built impermanent corridor constructed of tin sheets and wood which connects 422½ with a separate building to its south that a view of the Lorraine could be arranged. It is, of course, not impossible to enter the rooming house on South Main and arrive at a window which provides a view of the Lorraine balcony. It is, however, difficult to know that such a feat can be accomplished without advance knowledge of the connection between the two buildings and without knowing that the building south of 422½ is also a rooming house managed by the proprietors of the 422½ South Main establishment. The jurors might have been troubled by the failure of the prosecution to contemplate the curious complexity of the problem. They might have been stunned by the possibility that Ray had either inadvertently stumbled into a solution without even understanding the problem or that he had, as he had stated, been guided to the scene by someone with knowledge who had solved the problem for him.

If the jurors believed that Ray had managed to get to the bathroom window without help, as the prosecution had alleged, they would then have been confronted with the question of the origin of the shot. If the state had proof that the shot was fired from that window, it has not yet proffered it. It may very well be that a serious study of the autopsy documents, including contemporaneous notes, photographs, and X-rays, taken together with eyewitness testimony which may reconstruct the exact posture of Dr. King when he received the fatal bullet, will establish the angle of entry and thus the origin of the shot. In the absence of scholarly work by experts armed with the authority of the power of subpoena, who can say that he is content that the origin of the bullet is known? It is in this gray area of conjecture that the defense might have made significant gains. There were those in the Lorraine Motel courtyard and those on the balcony with Dr. King who believed that the shot may have been fired from a clump of bushes and scrub trees or the embankment between the rooming house and Dr. King and beneath the rooming house windows. As I have observed in the case of similar statements made by witnesses in the murder of President Kennedy, eyewitness testimony is generally less reliable than eyewitness testimony. It is often difficult to identify the origin of a sound with precision. By contrast, it is relatively simple to state where one saw an event occur. There is some additional evidence which supports the defense theory that the shot was
