

2/3/75

Dear Mr. Touchet,

I'm sorry the book did not reach you. There were a few other cases.

The unusual thing is that the post office is supposed to return what is found in the mail if there is an address on it. Short of total destruction, my address is on the book and not one has been returned. One part of a wrapper, disclosing cut edges, was in one case.

Except on weekends and with the mailing of which this will be part, because I have had to be away for two straight days, we have in every case mailed the books out within 24 hours of receiving the orders.

I am a one-man publisher. If I do not keep up to date a backlog can become a major problem. So I have to let other things go, and in every case I have, to package and mail the books.

Where I can't mail, as with this, I still do package each day's orders the day they come in.

The post office will not be open when I have to leave in the morning. However, I will take this and other books there on the morning of the fifth.

I'm sorry for the inconvenience for us both. Please believe me it was not my doing.

Would you please ask your local postmaster to have a search made? And if the book is not located there, at the next closest transfer point for mail, probably New Orleans?

They are not allowed to throw what can be salvaged away. They would have to sell a book as waste paper, so it can show up if they trace it if it merely went astray.

Sincerely,

Harold Weisberg
