The President, without declaring war or a national emergency, could call up National Guardsmen and other interview after the hearing reservists for 90 days under a that he favored the Pentagon requests from the military abide by the War Powers Resolution of 1973, which requires him to consult with Congress "before introducing United States armed forces into hos-tilities" and to submit detailed reports on the action shortly afterward.

Pentagon officials in testimony before a Senate Armed Services manpower subcommittee stressed that their request for more legislative authority to activitate reservists was not an attempt to end-run the war powers law.

Instead, said William K Brehm, assistant secretary of defense for manpower and reserve affairs, the idea is to make reservists a more usable addition to servicemen on active duty.

As the law stands now Brehm said, in the absence of a war or national emergency, the governors have to approve activation of National Guardsmen, and other reservists can be put on active duty for only 15 days.

The Pentagon wants the authority to activate up to 50,000 reservists on a selective basis for no more than 90 days. Key personnel-like reserve pilots needed for a sudden airlift to supplies—could be called up a unit at a time, for example.

"We cannot afford to spend $5.5 billion annually on a force oriented solely toward lengthy mobilization of the type envisioned in the past," Brehm said of the reserve

"The reserves themselves," he added, "must perceive that they can, and will, be called upon when needed. Their mo-rale, training and sense of purpose depend on it."

Secretary of Defense James R. Schlesinger, who made a brief appearance before the subcommittee before Brehm testified, said the extra au-
