Nixon Tax Return Held Incorrect

12/20/13 By Ronald Kessler Washington Post Staff Writer

President Nixon apparently underpaid his federal income taxes for his first four years in the White House by more than $13,000—or 17 per cent of the $78,651 he actually paid—because his returns were prepared in a manner described by the Internal Revenue Service and other tax authorities as improper under the law.

The underpayment occurred, according to a tax accountant who reviewed the President's tax returns for The Washington Post, because Mr. Nixon's accountant entered deductions for Mr. Nixon's business expenses on the wrong line on his returns.

The procedure, which involved stating the President's White House expense allowance as part of his gross income, made possible larger charitable deductions than Mr. Nixon otherwise would have been able to claim. This, in turn, lowered his taxes.

Presented a hypothetical case based on this procedure, an IRS spokesman agreed that the deductions had been made improperly under the law, and that the taxpayer had "no choice" but to make them another way, which would force him to pay higher taxes.

The possibility that Mr. Nixon underpaid his taxes because of incorrect filings would add a new issue to the growing controversy over Mr. Nixon's tax filings. In an effort to resolve previous tax issues, Mr. Nixon this month released copies of his returns, but that disclosure raised still more questions.

As a result, The Washington Post learned yesterday, the IRS, which last June said that Mr. Nixon's returns were correct, has now reopened its audit of his taxes. The agency, which is understood to be embarrassed by the questions raised since last spring, has begun interviewing participants in some of Mr. Nixon's transactions that have been criticized.

Mr. Nixon has characterized the questions raised publicly so far as issues that can be disputed by accountants and lawyers. These issues include the deductions Mr. Nixon took for the gift of his vice presidential papers to the government and his sale of most of his San Clemente property to two friends.

However, tax experts classify the apparent incorrect preparation of Mr. Nixon's returns as a matter not open to the same kind of dispute.

The IRS spokesman said the Internal Revenue Code provides no options on the issue in question. The tax lawyer who wrote the law involved, Sheldon S. Cohen, who was IRS commissioner under President Johnson, said Mr. Nixon's returns as filed are "clearly wrong" on this count.

Cohen cited what he said was an example from IRS regulations covering Mr. Nixon's situation, which he said showed that Mr. Nixon wou'd owe more taxes than he paid.

The accountant reviewing the President's returns for The Washington Post determined that the amounts Mr. Nixon should have paid, as against what he actually paid, were as follows:

Year Should Have Paid Paid 1972 $9,304 $4,298 1971 4,175 878 1970 793 793 1969 77,613 72,682

A White House spokesman referred inquiries to Arthur Blech, the Los Angles accountant who prepared Mr. Nixon's returns.

Blech said the returns were correct. The reason, he said, is that the $50,000 expense allowance from which the White House has said Mr. Nixon has taken his official expenses is not an expense allowance. Instead, he said the allowance is an additional salary.

Mr. Nixon receives a $200,-000 salary and a $50,000 payment described in the law as an expense allowance.

When told the law calls the payment an expense allowance, and that the IRS and other experts say an expense allowance must be deducted from a line different from the one Blech used, Blech said, "I don't care what they say. It was handled correctly."

Blech expressed confidence that this and all other issues concerning Mr. Nixon's returns would be resolved in his favor by the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, which is reviewing Mr. Nixon's returns at the President's request.

Essentially the question of how the President's expense allowance was listed on his returns is important because of the way Mr. Nixon's accountant determined the maximum charitable contributions that he was allowed to deduct from his taxes. The more deductions a taxpayer takes, the lower his taxes are.

In Mr. Nixon's case, the charitable deductions available were unusually large because of his gift of vice presidential papers to the government. This gift alone produced possible deductions of $570,000, spread over several years, some of which have yet to be taken.

However, the IRS places a limit on the total charitable contributions that can be claimed. In most of Mr. Nixon's years in the White House, the limit was 50 per cent of a taxpayer's "adjusted gross income."

The definition of this term is crucial. If the term is defined to include items—like Mr. Nixon's expense allowance—that would raise a taxpayer's adjusted gross income, his deductions, after the 50 per cent limit is applied, would be higher. If, on the other hand, the income figure is lower, the deductions allowed would be lower.

Federal tax forms, the instructions accompanying them, and the law governing them say that to arrive at adjusted gross income, a taxpayer must deduct from his gross income such items as moving expenses and other expenditures for which an employee is reimbursed through an expense account or allowance by his employer.

These deductions must be made on a particular line on the tax return. If they are not entered on that line, a taxpayer's adjusted gross income comes out higher, and a taxpayer subject to the 50 per cent charitable limitation ends up paying less in taxes.

Mr. Nixon's returns show

these deductions were not entered on the line in question. Instead, they were inserted later in the return. The result was that Mr. Nixon's adjusted gross income figure came out higher, and he was allowed more charitable deductions as a result.

Blech, Mr. Nixon's accountant, agreed that if the expenses in question were reimbursed by an expense allowance, Blech would have been required to enter them on the appropriate line.

But Blech contended that the $50,000 expense allowance that Mr. Nixon received in addition to his $200,000 a year salary is not an expense allowance.

An aide on the House Appropriations subcommittee with jurisdiction over the White House budget said yesterday that the law and the intent of Congress "could hardly make it clearer" that the $50,000 payment is an expense allowance, not a salary.

A spokesman for the General Accounting Office, the investigative arm of Congress, also said the payment is for expenses rather than salary.

Jonathan Sobeloff, a professor of tax law at Georgetown University Law School, after reviewing Mr. Nixon's returns, called Blech's claim that the expense allowance was not an expense allowance "awfully peculiar."

These and other authorities said this does not mean that Mr. Nixon cannot keep any part of the payment he does not need for expenss. They said such an expense arrangement is not uncommon among private employers.

Under the concept, the employer, rather than reimbursing employees for each taxi fare or entertainment expense he incurs, makes a lump sum payment to be used for expenses. If the employee does not have enough expenses to use up the allowance, he may keep the excess, provided he pays taxes on the remainder on his federal tax returns.

Mr. Nixon's tax returns show that in his first four years in office, his official business expenses in each year amounted to less than the $50,000 allowance given him for each year. In 1972, for example, Mr. Nixon had expenses of $28,541 for maintenance of offices at his San Clemente and Florida homes and other items. These expenses left Mr. Nixon with a balance of about $20,000 that he retained from his expense allowance.
