

NYTimes

When Insanity Holds the Scepter

By Russel V. Lee

Craziness occurs in kings, Psychotic emperors, presidents, prime ministers and dictators have left their smudged marks on every page of history. Some rule today. An inquiry in depth into the role of madness in human affairs would provide a fascinating field to be cultivated by a team of historians and psychiatrists. The harvest of bizarre events wrought by deranged leaders would be a rich one.

This is not surprising, for 5 per cent of all men are mad. By simple statistical probability some of these men will achieve power. Indeed, this likelihood exceeds probability for a number of reasons. In a dynastic regime tendencies to aberration, which are often genetically linked, are passed on to the hereditary parent, often exaggerated by inbreeding.

In a democratic regime the very qualities of egocentrism and megalomania, characteristic of many psychologists, are precisely those that lead men to aspire to high office. In fact, there are those who say that the very fact of aspiration to high office is also a proof of mental derangement. I would not go so far.

In our time we have seen one of the most highly developed and intellectual peoples of all time completely subjected to the absolute power of a textbook paranoiac — Adolf Hitler. Such phenomena, also for mankind, tend to be recurrent.

In the days gone by such exorbitant, while deplorable, were rulers. Sometimes they were amusing enough to add to the nation's gaiety, as in the case of mad King Ludwig I of Bavaria, or fatuous, the last ruler of Egypt. To be sure, the demented George III lost the British crown its brightest jewel, and a little later the diminutive, strutting paranoiac, Napoleon Bonaparte, bathed all Europe in blood and left the flower of France to perish in the snows of Russia.

The events of the terrible twentieth century, which led up to this awesome denouement, provide the best examples of the power of madmen to abolish rational behavior. The century opened on an optimistic and complacent world — a world that believed in progress, democracy in time all would be well.

We knew, of course, that there were a few despots like Russia, but we believed this would change. We were practical. We talked peace and armed ourselves to the teeth. But what we were stupid — stupid enough to tolerate madmen in positions of power. They brought us to the brink of destruction. Kaiser Wilhelm II was the first. This unfortunate birth-maimed, mother-hating, vain, insecure, struttings, adroitous adult aristocrat ruled Germany, played with it as a boy does with his fine mind was shattered, his judgment that he was not a normal man, but they did nothing.

When the events at Sarajevo took place the Kaiser was unwilling to stop the avalanche toward war. These men, of course, merely extrapolations and idealizations of all time completely subjected to the absolute power of a textbook paranoiac — Adolf Hitler. The others were abnormal in their psychological, devoid of mercy, devoid of foresight, savage to send their own sons of total incapacity to Utopia to a war-sick world.

But he was not mentally sound. He had had a number of "little strokes"; his second wife, Edith, and his physician, occupied the Presidency for nine months of total incapacity.

The others were abnormal in their psychological, devoid of mercy, devoid of foresight, savage to send their own sons to the front.

Nicholas II was weak if wise, but an intellectual, by any means, who was influenced by his wife, Alexandra, who was weak-willed Czar in the long train of Russia. So, by sad exchange we had the invincible Kaiser and the despot of Sarajevo and a host of paranoiacs, and enormous powerful positions in the world. The result was the senseless World War I — a war in which the best young men of Flanders with genetic effects on the stock of both countries that are all too apparent today.

The Peace of Versailles, which could have ushered in the brave new world, was a travesty. It was the product of strange men, none of whom was strictly normal or psychologically stable. The chief character, of course, was Woodrow Wilson — one of the tragic figures of history. His was the most brilliant brain that had ever occupied the Presidency, with a popularity in Europe never approached by any American before or since, in a position where he could have brought Utopia to a war-sick world.

But he was not mentally sound. He had had a number of "little strokes"; his fine mind was shattered, his judgment was gone, and he was unaware of the change. He went on with his diseases to complete desugard and, by virtue of gross fraud on the part of his second wife, Edith, and his physician, occupied the Presidency for nine months of total incapacity.

The others were abnormal in their

psychological, devoid of mercy, devoid of foresight, savage to send their own sons to the front.

The problem to doctors, psychiatrists and political scientists. Doctors occupy a special position. A position of privileged communication and maintenance of complete reticence about the patient's condition must be abrogated

when the patient is the President, a fascinated him, and he all but lied us

in. France had a series of alcoholic prime ministers during the interlude.

We need widespread discussion of the problem by doctors, psychiatrists and political scientists. Doctors occupy

a special position. A position of privileged communication and maintenance

of complete reticence about the pa-

tient's condition must be abrogated

when the patient is the President, a

fascinated him, and he all but lied us

in. France had a series of alcoholic

prime ministers during the interlude.

The man of steel and ruthless slayer of millions of his own people; completely devoid of scruple of any kind, he was a sociopath, a moral imbecile, and in complete control of Russia.

Hitler could well have been used in the medical school classroom as a classic example of paranoia. Alas for the world, he achieved a wider stage.

He had profound egocentricity, delusions of persecution (the Jews) combined with considerable sagacity—all characteristic of the paranoid state.

We all knew he was abnormal. We fascinated him, and he all but lied us

in. France had a series of alcoholic

prime ministers during the interlude.

We need widespread discussion of

the problem by doctors, psychiatrists

and political scientists. Doctors occupy

a special position. A position of priv-

ileged communication and maintenance

of complete reticence about the pa-

tient's condition must be abrogated

when the patient is the President, a

fascinated him, and he all but lied us

in. France had a series of alcoholic

prime ministers during the interlude.

APR 1, 1974

The interface between the two sides of Hitler differentiated by almost radical differences, first to appear was Mussolini, strange figure, ignorant, delusional, ignorant, and a host of paranoiacs, and amorous psychopaths. He is not easy to classify, very hooliganistic, but he certainly was not more than the average Hitler, he was

weak-willed Czar in the long train of Russia. So, by sad exchange we had the invincible Kaiser and the

despot of Sarajevo and a host of

paranoiacs, and enormous

powerful positions in the world. The result was the senseless World War I — a war in which the best young men were lost in the mud of Gallipoli.

Russia, home to some 500 million people, which has now emerged from its long period of stagnation and is now a major economic power.

It is not clear whether the official recognition of Congress has received from those