Dear Mr. Palamara,

Thanks for your kind comments in your 3/2. For the rest, close but ~~no~~ cigar!

Your well-intended friend got everything twisted. This illustrates what can happen when people get to talking about the assassinations and then some of that gets into print. And how people are so persuaded of what is not so.

I have never lectured in Florida. And it was not at such a lecture that his daughter got up. She also did not say, "My father knew the real story of what happened."

Later than what really happened, Kellerman did die in Florida. But:

It was at the University of Maryland.

Kellerman's daughter did not get up and say a word.

She waited in the line of those who wanted to speak to me or get books autographed, in silence, and giving up her place in line as other students got into that line. Finally she was the only one in line. She then thanked me for what I'd said about her father and Greer, refuting what Manchester had said about them, and she added that she hoped the day would come when those men could say in public what they told their families.

While this is an ambiguity, it is not at all what your friend said.

It ~~was~~<sup>need</sup> have been no more than what I think it was, that they did not agree with the Warren report.

So, please caution your friend about spreading such improvisations around as fact and ask him, as I also ask you, to correct what he said to others so that there will not be still more troublesome rumors spread as fact.

Sincerely,

Harold Weisberg

Dear Mr. Weisberg,

A fellow researcher from Canada told me that, during one of your fine lectures down in Florida, none other than one of Secret Service agent Roy Kellerman's daughters got up and said something rather controversial (something to the effect of, "My father knew the real story of what happened" -?). If it is possible, I would be grateful if you could share this information with me. You are a man I greatly respect (I think "Post Mortem" is a classic)!

Sincerely,
Vince Palamara
